Daniel Craig is another great example. An interviewer was asking all these questions about the "Bond girls" and referred to Monica Bellucci as playing an older sexual conquest. He replied with, "you mean someone MY age ?"The "catsuit" question that still comes up so often was lampshaded even back in the era of Galaxy Quest where Sigourney Weaver's character complains that TV Guide asked the men character questions while her segment was "all about my boobs and how they fit in my costume!" That reporter that asked why there were so many women in a 'mans' movie is disgusting. I feel the same way if someone were to refer to a movie as a 'girls' movie. I do have to agree with this video to many sexi ^{est} questions are asked towards female singer, actresses and even every day women. Asking a woman about her body size, shape or appearance in general is rude. Now is the woman in general wants to tell how she stays in shape, she love/sex or what she wears is her decision not the interviewer's. If the interviewer gets a question like it they would see that it's rude. Like when the readio hosts ask if you had to use you cell or make up one last time which would it be... Well for one I being female don't wear makup all the time nor am I on my cell. So to be honest Ariana may not wear makeup when she is not in public nor is it for me to judge her on her decisions. So ask gender neutral questions and respect the answers you get.	Gender, Woman	Gender - General	3/155	1.935
Literally only two of these are sexist (scar jo wearing underwear and number 1). Actors get asked about their workout ALL THE FUCKING TIME! (Christian Bale for Batman, Jason Manoa for Aquaman, the mountain for GOT). The Anne Hathaway in Les Miserables one really pissed me off because the interviewer literally asked her for how she felt about the whole situation! Hows that sexist you idiots! This confuses me, why can't everyone agree on these things and stop trying to one-up eachother with more and more.Again, I'm a woman and even I am getting tired of hearing the push by feminists. There's the feminists that want women to have rights, and then there's the feminists that are obnoxious and are never satisfied and want to keep getting more and more. when there is a extreme change in fitness dudes get asked those questions. However most actresses always get that question asked even if they didnt change their appearance. Even then, it wouldnt be so bad if those werent the only questions being asked. If Scarlett got asked questions about character development (as RDJ) about the future of the character (as chris pratt) about the difficulties of mentally transforming into that character (as Tom Holand and Dr Strange got asked) maybe this fitness questions would be so sexist. But she is always asked: fitness, body, diet and fashion. Honestly the majority of these weren't the least bit sexist. Men biologically on average are stronger than woman , and when she had a warm up game with a male player nowhere near the top, she got absolutely slammed. Celebrity males get asked all the time how they're able to obtain their professional and personal life, they just don't take it in the wrong way. Anne Hathaway was probably the most ridiculous; the actor, Christian Bale, that plays the main character in that exact film has been asked that question all the time. Is it only sexist when it's asked of actresses? The majority of the other people simply took the question the wrong way and just looked like absolute bitches (especially TS, people point out that you go on and on about your exes because it's exactly what you do. You use them for publicity, that's why people don't like you, not because you're female).You lot seriously need to stop patting yourselves on the back and crying victim. It's just so cringy to watch.	Woman	Gender - General	1/175	0.571
Even most men today will say they are not sexist, but then in actual regards to sexism they live within it blindly. They will validate more relevant requests to other men. Then in regards to women will deviate and be more basic. I honestly regard modern feminism as trash. Simply for the fact its largely about the utter subjugation of men, and women being dominate (the initial movement was more remarkable than this, and sent a good message). I'm all for empowerment and true equality for both men and women.	Sexism	Gender - General	1/90	1.111

Arinrin 001 It wasn't for the lastest movie, though. And one interview question should be generalised to all interview questions. Her character, although a part of the main five, was probably the least popular out of all of them, other than probably hawk eye. The others have crazy charismatic characters, and therefore are more likely going to be asked about their characters.	Crazy	Physical Identity - Physical (and Mental) Impairments	1/62	1.613
Katelynn Pearce It was sexist because he asked the woman about shallow, looks-based things, and asked the man actual character-driven meaningful questions. His questions define her as the pretty ornament and him as the character worth finding out more about. Jesus fucking Christ this isn't hard.	Woman	Gender - General	1/46	2.174

Katelynn Pearce It's easy. The questions follow one after the other and you'd see how different they are. It's best if say, in the same interview they were ALL asked about their fitness regime, or in another, they were ALL asked about character development and other questions that could help break down the complexity of the roles they play. And as for the underwear question, it's sexist just because of the simple fact that instead of focusing on the characters of both of them (man and woman), the suit/costume SHE had to wear got in the way of what should have been much better/appropriate questions.	Woman	Gender - General	1/105	0.952
The question was asking what her favorite 'position' was. It implied that the question meant 'sexual position', but she answer the question by saying an 'occupational position', specifically one that was considered powerful (CEO of a company is top level). She was avoiding answering a sex question by exploiting the fact that position also means job. I honestly don't know if she meant to avoid the implied question because it was sexist or because it made her uncomfortable.	Sex	Gender - General	1/78	1.282

Crofregrnash of course men don't need to be asked about being best 'male' athletes. Over the history of humankind man has been on field of battle, fighting and general athletes competition and it's obvious and given the opportunity Serena won't be able to compete male athletes. So within the circle of athletes you don't ask king if he is the king of particular gender as there can be only one king from both gender . If you still don't get it refer some biological facts about male and female body, it's not just about the muscularity it also talks about hormones functioning.	Gender	Gender - General	2/101	1.98
dhamin iqbal the thing is, men never get asked to play against the best females to prove that they are the best athletes, but women do. Assuming from first hand that female are worst. And some dudes even follow the "i know biology cause i saw it in second grade" argument of "men are better than women cause they are stronger" nevertheless they take away other factors that play into sports like strategy, resistance, intelligence etc. so yeah kinda sexist for assuming one gender is better than the other. To people doubting the sexism of the Serena Williams one: do you ever hear people ask - idk - Tom Brady how it feels to be the best male athlete? The name of the athlete doesn't matter - look at most male athletes and the praise they get. It's never made as blatantly clear that they are male and by constantly putting 'female' before awards that women get, it suggests that they and their accomplishments aren't comparable to a mans. It doesn't just apply to sports. Take comedy, for example. When a male comic is interviewed/awarded/spoken of in general, people feel no need to explicitly state the fact that they are male. Female comic on the other hand? It's constantly mentioned that they are female, and they are constantly bombarded with stupid questions about 'how it feels to be a female comic'. It implies that female comedians are unnatural; that male comedians are the default and the norm. B.S. On that last point, you should look up Amy Poehler and Tina Fey because they've discussed how stupid, demeaning and annoying this is for women. They did one interview with E! where the guy asked about their gender in relation to their job and the pair's reaction was priceless. (Also, maybe guys do get asked about their workout regimen, but nowhere near as much. And not on a panel with all their costars - the ScarJo one was degrading for her because she was with a bunch of other castmates that day and whilst they got asked about storylines/acting, all the press wanted to pry from her were beauty tips. Again, diminishing B.S.)	Gender, Sexism	Gender - General	2/272	0.735

Wow. Ok, I'm trying not to be offended and think you're tolling. Bear with me. In any case, do you understand that there are at least a few people who are reading this and you're promoting horrible gender and sexual stereotypes? You are making people feel like they HAVE to be emotional or not emotional based on their gender . It is utter nonsense. Being emotional or not emotional is such horrible stereotype that It is strongly affecting how men and women are expected to behave. Men are conditioned from birth to be stoic and women are taught that they are allowed to be emotional (yet they are weak because of it). Women are given more license to act vulnerable, but not confident. My best friend is a VERY emotional bisexual female. I am a very stoic bisexual female (and I will admit that it is probably a combination of genetics and upbringing). I have known VERY emotional straight, gay , and bisexual men, as well as plenty of men who conform to cultural expectations of invulnerability. And I've known a few trans people who give no shits about gender conformity. Yes, there is probably a genetic biological factor in how we all behave, but please honestly question and investigate your ideas of what is considered masculine and feminine. Think about why YOU think the way you do. Are you repeating the ideas of family and friends, or are you speaking from objective observation of everyone around you? Are you looking into scientific studies? Are you making sure that those studies have repeatable non-biased conclusions? Are you open to conclusions not supported by your upbringing? Seriously, do you really want to say that this ('feminism' which is a cultural shift towards gender equality) is an attack against YOU, and what you think is the definition of woman . Are you so attached to your idea of male or female that you need to impose it on people you interact with? Just please think about things. Please don't hurt others. I would be ok with feminism if it actually did mean equality of sexes. But its really promoting the idea that women are huge victims and men are horrible and people are slowly turning it into an idea that women are better than men. Feminists try to find something to make themselves look like a victim of, when really the statement and/or question has nothing to do with gender its just a damn question. How are any of these questions sexist? Is sexism not defined as discrimination based on sex ? So just because you get asked a question that is generally feminine, and you are a female, it's sexist because men don't get asked the same question? 10 is not sexist against women. There are hundreds of better tennis players than Williams playing right now, thousands that have played, they just happen to be male. If she wants to be the best period, she would have to beat ranked males, which she knows she can't do. Just like they can't be her, with all of the things that make her special.So, what is wrong with being the best female? 8 Is sexist against men and Ms. Mojo and Knightly don't even get it,: men that are not asked are just not expected to focus on personal life and relationships, but instead die early and provide for others by being all about career 100. Maybe they want personal lives too? 7 Teen Vogue is a girls' mag often focusing on beauty.The boy doesn't get asked hair or beauty questions because the feamle readers/viewers don't want to look like him. They probably don't even want to look AT him. Let's see a male and female film director get interviewed side by side by a movie mag, and I bet the female director will not get asked about her hair. 4 Is Ms. Mojo being sexist against men again. Rowan and Ms. Mojo don't get that not only do boys have to answer questions about sports/fitness/lifting etc but more importantly they have to answer questions about career path/plans, cars, etc. The Arianna Grande question was not gendered, it was genred, If she was a college prof. or a circuit court judge, she wouldn't have gotten asked it. She looks like and sings to a person that cares about make up and phones. Just like plenty of male stars look like they could get asked about choosing between their stupid expensive toys/hobbies. Pretty sure someone could ask one if it's his gun or his guitar . But nobody would cry sexist. Sexism against women exists, there are even some examples here in the video, but overall this entitled video is why people should be egalitarians not feminists. Most of these, save for one, are blown way out of proportion.The reason women are asked what designer they are wearing is because;1. There are people that watch the Red Carpet that want to know that fact.2. It is a plug/promotion for the designer.3. Most of the time the dresses are loaned one of a kind, so the designer should already get credit and the aforementioned promotional mention or their work.The reason men are not asked this question is often are;1. Almost nobody cares. Most tuxedos look pretty much the same, and 2. Because tuxedos can be worn more than once, unlike dresses, which have to be different every time for every movie and actress.The reason the dress is panned up from the feet Is people want to see the full dress and how it fits.3. The reason why women are asked about how they get into their tones psychical shape is (say it with me) people want to know how they can achieve the same results. Also, actors are asked this question all the time. The press raves about how buff the guys are when the put on muscle for movies.4. The underwear question the Scarlet Johansen was asked about her Black Widow costume would be asked of anyone regardless of sex of it is skin tight.5. Speaking of Miss Johansen, the a reason she was not asked about her character arc is Black Widow especially at that time had no arc to ask about. Furthermore, I'd argue that being a feminist is considered socially acceptable. You get celebrities calling themselves feminists. Large brands purposefully presenting gender in more progressive contexts. And you get social movements that are fueled by feminist perspectives. I see people saying it's not sexist to say best female because she is a woman , but the point is that the title was "best sports PERSON" so in that category it's self she is being judged alongside men. Refering to it as "best female" doesnt take into consideration the men she beat to earn that title. She is one of the greatest athletes to ever live, male or female. To only ever judge her in a purely female category diminishes her accomplishments. People say things like "You're just a girl" all the time to make women feel lesser, so that's why we fight to be recognised as on a par with men. Men, you're already told you're powerful all the time so no, it's not as sexist If you say "best male athlete". In this world having it pointed out that you're a man does not diminish you, it actually empowers you more. No, I am a female, born and raised, and the problem is that feminists get grouped together with "feminazis". The feminazis are the annoying ass old lesbian women that say that "men are all evil and should be exterminated from the planet." They get them mixed up, but the thing that the feminists and feminazis have in common is that they both try to shove their ideologies down people's throats and it's really irritating. I don't want to hear you rant about "the wage gap" or that "men only view women as objects" when I'm just trying to have a normal conversation. Yes, if someone does/says something out of line, I will condone that tirade and even join in, but I don't need your input on the nature of our twisted society everytime I ask if you saw the new episode of [insert show I don't watch here] last night. I don't get it either. Feminism is just taking the negativity, the pejorative out of feminine terms and attributes, it ultimately serves all genders well. After all, if you're a guy, do you really want some dull, tittering, looks-obsessed female gazing slack-jawed at you? Don't you want to hang with people with opinions and quick wit? I refuse to believe so many men, especially men that want to be seen as "strong", are so intimidated by a woman with opinions and wit that they denigrate people like these. No one likes shallow people, NO ONE does.....encourage more answers to dumb questions like these (or be prepared to ask the shallow question of EVERYONE on the panel - who wouldn't want to know what underwear the Hulk wears?) More likely what they resent are specious constructs unto ideological ends. (The evil Patriarchy , women as the victims of History, rape culture, gender pay-gap, a pink-tax, systemic sexism , implicit bias (a metric that its creators have grudgingly admitting was never meant to measure what feminists are trying to use it to measure, and has the added benefit of absolutely no statistical evidence showing it actually works. There is actually more evidence that people come to resent being told they have a "flaw" that only a select group – conveniently excluding them – are capable of detecting or even commenting on!). Either that or they resent the notion that equality is served by a group out to change the world based entirely upon the issues, perceptions, wants and needs of just 1/2 the population – determined entirely by what genitals they're sporting. Jake Even the '70's was stellar in this regard. As a boy I would take off on my bike early in the morning, leaving a note roughly outlining where I MIGHT be, and explore the city without being in danger. If I wasn't going to be home before the streetlights came on, I would bum a dime for the pay-phone from some stranger saying I had to phone home. More than a few of them (if I chose wisely!) would ask me if I was hungry and buy me something to eat. Hollie Harlow Actually wage equality is a function of both merit and assertiveness. If you are doing and equal job to a man and devoting equal time to it and are getting a lower wage you need to stand up for yourself to the boss. There are no legal impediments, no "glass ceiling" just because one is not automatically recognized and rewarded. Where we need to work on equality now, is in equal sexual and social responsibility. Women have been handed a lot over the eons and really, most men have willingly done it. But if the call is for true equal treatment, women need to start carrying the load of their social and sexual responsibility – which BTW does NOT mean creating more single-parent children. Part of your sexual responsibility is to make sure you end up with a quality man who will take fathering seriously – and then not nagging him away with reactive abuse.	Sexual	Gender - General	3/157	1.911

lockandloadlikehell Exactly. Feminism is to the point where it's actively sabotaging women. Far far far too many women installed in places of power because of their genitals and not their merit are making a string of horrendous decisions that only reinforce the very old narrative that women are far too emotional to hold positions of power. And let's not forget flood of garbage science various University Grievance Studies courses are responsible for injecting into the society's knowledge base. Things like a 1990 study commissioned by the UUAW (who should have been intelligent enough to know better) aimed at proving "feelings of marginalization" in school girls over boys. Their study group consisted of 3,400 girls and just 600 boys – and of course they found that almost twice as many girls reported these feelings as boys.	Old	Age - Over 65s	1/135	0.741
INDIGO BLUEoO It also does great psychological harm to women in promoting a victimhood narrative that just is not backed by stats or science. There's suppose to be all these huge aggressions and oppressions against them, but they have to go 4 generations into the past to find them by trans-temporal proxy. Or find them micro-scopically in micro-aggressions. Or expand the scope to such amorphous constructs like "systemic racism " that really defies ANY meaningful analysis. They push for "implicit bias training" that data shows actually increases a resent-based bias; and even the creators of the test and process admit they never intended it for this purpose. Then you get specious constructs like the wage gap, glass ceiling, rape culture. The net effect is the reinforcement of the tired old narrative that women are too emotional, too fragile, too incompetent and too irrational to be treated as equals OR hold positions of power without copious protections, supports and entitlements(Which BTW, I don't personally believe!) I haven't had time to read the replies but i did have a thought about when people say feminism is about equality... it isn't about equality, egalitarian is equality. from what other people say and do, i see feminism as a social cancerous cult that put women above men in a crisis and other minor situations. society throughout the world is pretty feminist.for committing the same crime, men get more jail time, more men than women are homeless, more men than women suffer with mental health because there is more help for women, in the usa there are countless more help centers for women who are victims/survivors of domestics, female genital mutilation is not allowed but the equally dangerous and mostly unneeded removal of baby boys foreskin is very legal and sadly quite popular, the courts tend to side more with the mothers when families separate than the fathers even though the majority of father are just as good a parent as the mothers but are seen as less important, thus leading to mental health with very little help.... the list goes on... that's why i am anti feminist. that's why i am egalitarian. Anna Ochieng Well, I'm a women myself. You're the blind one and I'm not sexist AT ALL. Really, because my thoughts are different and that makes me a sexist? You're the one that doesn't think on your own. Women cannot be equal to men. Did you know that numbers show each year that women and men earn ALMOST even money? No right, because the media says something completely different. Men make more hours and have more responsibilities, so more money! But because of this problem, women are more likely to get a job now because 'Oh, women are so sad'. Boys in elementary school are being extremely oppressed. These boys cannot be boys anymore, because when they act like one they get labeled with things like adhd. This is extremely unhealthy, because this is in their nature. BUT girls for instant: they're calm, they play with dolls, they're the PERFECT example how everyone should be, so boys are getting forced to act like this! Women have more rights in a divorce, men commit more suicide. It's horrible, I have hundreds of more examples. Men are being oppressed and have less rights. Clash Gamer But we are no wolves. In many parts of nature there are female lead groups (lions, elephants, killer whales) and there are herd animals, in which a friendly male has a higher status than a macho male, cause he supports the entire group. An example for the last one is a human ape species, I think it was Bonobo or chimpanzee, so one of our closest relative. And by the way the alpha wolf myth is not even true. A wolf pack is lead by a couple (not single male) and this couple is not chosen, because of its aggression, but because of its capability to hold the group together. Yes, you are right that more man commit suicide and that it is a side effect of feminism, but in a completely different way, than you said. Women nowadays can life perfectly well without a man, which leaves more man alone. But because man do not openly talk about emotions with other man, because of manly stereotypes, and women not being available all the time to talk about feelings to like they used to be, men start to lock their emotions away, which leads to them getting depressed, cause they can't open up (again manly stereotypes) and then they kill themselves. Without the "Men don't show emotions" bullshit there would be far less suicides. And feminists are trying to tackle this specific issue.And that this stereotype is idiotic can easily be seen by the fact, that in Sparta (war centered, still seen as incredibly manly culture nowadays) soldiers, who didn't cry during funerals, were considered weak, unemotional and not fit to serve in a group, and people, we would consider alpha males, were seen as to aggressive and selfish to lead a troop. And some of the most powerful leaders are known as very emotional people, for example Marc Aurel, Alexander the Great, Augustus and Abraham Lincoln. So the strong alpha male, aggressive leader type is basically bullshit, because aggression might let you control a group, but only temporarily until they rise against you, while compassion can allow you to actually lead a group. And in the long run it will hurt you more than anyone around you.	Ape	Ethnicity - Black	1/371	0.27

Clash Gamer Man are generally as emotional as women. Just because you are not as emotional as your sister does not mean, that a man is less emotional than a woman in general. And for men to be considered weak, when they open up, is one of the main reason of male suicide. Which is why feminists are trying to fight it. It is not about the way we feel emotions, but how we handle them. While woman can open up to their friends about their feelings, man are not allowed to do so. And that is the main problem. And that man can be as emotional as women is seen in a ton of cultures. So please stop blaming feminism for higher suicide rates. Just like we tried to get woman financially and socially independent from a man, we now try to get men emotionally independent from woman . But people like you, who claim that man must not show emotions, are hindering us and lead to higher suicide rates. And considering all world religions are lead by men, founded by men and men have a higher social status in them than women, man are more or just as likely to follow religion.So there is no biological difference when it comes to emotion, just a trained one. buecherdrache1 Really a sign of weakness? And you know that cause you're a man? But guess what I live in a area without any feminism also we are taught to be though by learning to work at a young age , as an example I helped my father's hunting team to butcher a moose before I started at school.But guess what I've more than once been listning to men sharing their emotions with me and that's not because they see it as a sign of weakness, they did it because they trusted me. Maybe that's the problem that men don't trust their friends enough to tell it. Especially in these times men can't trust women cause they are the ones that makes most divorces and are seeing masculinity as something bad.	Age	Age - General	1/131	0.763

Clash Gamer I never said nor saw masculinity as a bad thing. And did you ever question why women often want out of a marriage? Like there might be abuse involved and different to a man, who is getting abused, a woman can openly state it and want to leave the marriage, while men are often made fun of, when they do (which is an issue feminism is tackling too). I said, that man should have the right to choose what they want to do, without anyone judging them for it being not masculine enough. If they choose the masculine side that is perfectly fine to me too, as long as they had the choice. And men do not think more rational, I mean most suicide bombers are male, and I wouldn't consider that rational thinking. Additionally there are very few differences between male and female brain, the only real difference is, that the part responsible for emotions is slightly larger (around 1) in male than in female. So there are no real differences between man and woman brain wise, who are not trained. And about me: yes I am female, but I do a lot of things most people see as masculine. I have been doing karate since I was 6, I love going on lonely, multiple day wilderness hikes, I enjoy gaming and study astrophysics right now. If I would hate masculine things, I would have to hate all of my hobbies. But I don't because I want people to have the right to do what they want, independent from their gender, and accept whatever they choose, because I consider both sexes perfectly equal in all ways. You obviously don't think so.	Gender, Woman	Gender - General	3/284	1.056
--	---------------	------------------	-------	-------

Clash Gamer It is true that men develop things like considering consequences later than women, because they start puberty later. But once puberty is through both are approximately the same. Approximately, because there are minor differences statistically, but for example that doesn't mean woman can't do math as good as a man or that man can not take care of kids, because the statistic says so. But people think that that is how it is, which is why feminism is important. That main aim is to first see an individual person instead of a gender . An example is me, while studying physics. Though there are less women than men in my course, the ratio is far better than most people think (40:60). But when I am in a group of otherwise only men and we are getting questioned about a subject by a male tutor, I always get the easiest questions. But I can answer all of his questions, not just the easiest ones. Even though this might seem like good thing for me, I actually hate it, because I have an advantage, which I simply don't need and don't want, I am obviously perceived as less capable, even though I study it just like the others, and the others hate me, because I have an advantage. In an ideal world I would be asked the difficult questions as well (which is what the female tutors do), because they would judge me based on the fact, that I study physics, not on the fact that I have boobs.That is why feminism is important. We need to judge a person based on their decisions, abilitys and actions and allow them to pursue a career or a life, they want to pursue, and then treat them accordingly, independent from their gender . It is all about choice and being human, before being male or female, cause those differences are far to small to use them as basis for judgment.	Gender, Woman	Gender - General	3/327	0.917
Agnete Thomsen Then I'm not a feminist.Cause mens suicides is mostly at the age of 15, and that's the time in the times of school and school isn't made for boys cause boys has more adrealin than girls and start evolving their consequensive thinking 2 years after girls, which makes school more made for girls than boys which means harder time in school for boys and harder to get good results for boys which I see as a really good theory why men commit more suicides.But did you see the differences in my arguments and your beloved feminist-argument? I will tell you that, and that is that my argument included facts which is biolocial differences between men and women, while you used a theory about "toxic masculinity" which has no scientific explanaiton and most psycholohists see the theory as unlikely.It's just a theory created by feminists and theories is what I see often in arguments like theories about the gender wage gap being sexist and more. And that is why I'm not a feminist because I use facts instead of assuming things without any people with scientific experiences that believes in the theories.	Age, Gender	Age - General, Gender - General	2/196	1.02

Clash Gamer Schools are not well made for anyone growing up. No personal development, horrible social structure, bad sleep cycles and puberty are a bad mixture no matter the gender. And about hormones: I considered including them a first, but though there are different gender ratios overall, it is still common for people to have a different hormonal build than someone of their gender usually has. And though it is true that man have generally more adrenaline, the female hormonal cycle is far more difficult (aka mood swings) , because of periods and pregnancy, while the male one is quite stable. Additionally chemical birth control was first tried on male, but was considered morally unacceptable, because of it's hormonal side effects (which could lead to suicide) , so they found one for women, which has the very same side effects, but they did nor care that much about that and woman already had mixed up hormones so why not make it a bit worse? So yeah, basing something on hormones is pretty unstable, because everyone has slightly different dosages and reactions to them and considering men are quite stable, while women go through far more and heavier influences and changes during a month, women should be more influenced and likely to act on them and thus more likely to commit suicide. But they aren't, because they have often got a better social net to catch them. This social net should equally be provided for men, but is not in some places, which is what feminist want to change.	Common, Gender, Woman	Gender - General, Social Class - Working class	5/258	1.938

Clash Gamer Yes and this thinking is trained, it is something you were taught. But humans, who are social creatures, have empathy and compassion, so they can understand someone elses emotion, otherwise living with others would not be possible. The thought, that others can not understand or simply don't want to understand your emotions, which is why you should keep them to yourself, is taught, it is not natural. And that sharing your feelings can help you understand them and also feel accepted and over all better, is simply proven by the fact, that therapy or self-help-groups help. And yes common emotion pass, but trauma or depression so everything severe enough does not pass. But men are taught, that they will pass as well and just swallow them, until they are too big, too powerfull to keep down and overwhelm them, leading to suicide. Women talk about them before this happens, so they rarely get to the point of suicide. Actually countries with less close and personal social structure tend to have higher suicide rates. So keeping emotions in can be unhealthy and is unnatural, no matter the gender. As I already said, our brains are far to similiar to allow such big differences naturally.PS: By the way, you first said, you and your friends talk about feelings all the time, now you said you don't. Which one is it?	Common, Gender	Gender - General, Social Class - Working class	2/231	0.866
Clash Gamer You said that a bunch of guys have talked to you about feelings and emotions, but suddenly, you said you rarely talked and just one guy talked to you about it (and felt bad afterwards). So what happened to the others, or were there no others? But it actually really doesn't matter, cause that botteling up feelings and emotions is often harmful (no matter the gender), is something science has proofed over and over. No matter if you like it or not.	Gender	Gender - General	1/84	1.19

Clash Gamer And anonymous group meetings and help hotlines? Those people rarely are professionals, still it helps alot. As someone with severe anxiety disorders resulting into depression, who does not like to talk, I kind of know how it feels to bottle it up, because I had mental problems for over 6 years until I finally broke down and told my parents. And it helped alot, cause it shows that the person you talk to cares and that you and your emotions are valid, are OK. And once you accepted them, you can tackle them. Pushing them down, denying them, is not gonna make them dissappear. An example is the death of someone you loved. If you deny yourself the sadness and push it away, it will stay for you for much longer, than if you accept the death and the sadness and live trough it. Some people rather grief alone, which is OK, but most people want to talk about the person they lost, and thus about the feelings they lost with them. But both types accept the sadness, don't just swallow it. And there is no difference between genders, just slight personal differences. A friend of mine with less severe issues has chosen therapy, because he prefers talking, while I still am not in any therapy, cause I prefer to face problems my own way and then try it traditionally if it doesn't work. But bottling up doesn't work at all for severe cases and just ends badly, cause it goes against basic human nature.	Mental	Physical Identity - Physical (and Mental) Impairments	1/257	0.389
Clash Gamer And I never said they don't. But in (at first sight) less severe issues especially men often don't dare to talk about there feelings, because they were taught just swallow them and they are worried others might not understand them and consider them weak or stupid. But sharing emotions always helps and actually supports healthy relationships of all kinds. So teaching your child no matter the gender to openly talk about things that bother or hurt them is very important as well as teaching them to listen to the worries of others.And why are you so focused on only men? After a death my entire family supports each other or, if it just hit one person really hard, support that person, no matter the gender . Female and male brains feel and react basically the same, when raised equally, which is really important for a working, connected community. Which leads to these issues is the very, segregated thinking you show.	Gender	Gender - General	2/162	1.235
buecherdrache1 But I've never been taught that sharing emotions is a sign of weakness and still I don't do it.And men and women do think differently, we can see that in things such as different workplaces in the gender wage gap and other things.	Gender	Gender - General	1/45	2.222

Clash Gamer Media and culture often portray it that way, which means you have been taught unconsciously. And if you never shared your emotions, how would you know it can't help?And about the rest: I already explained, that women and men basically think alike, when raised the same way, so the different thinking are obviously taught and thus not gender dependent. Centuries of women doing men and men doing women's jobs show that. All of the other things you said have been either proven to be directly through the misogyny , you are defending here, or to simply not be true.If you are not ready to take anything I said into consideration, or blatantly ignore it, like you did when writing that women and men think differently naturally, (which I already disproved in a few paragraphs, you didn't say anything to) I guess we can stop this debate, as you obviously don't want to understand or grow, but are instead stuck in your ways. So keep blaming women and femisim for male suicide. Explain to everyone, that men naturally don't want to share emotions. Ignore the numbers and the proof. If it satisfies you to never grow, learn or change, than just ignore the arguments, brought up against you, like you did here.	Gender, Misogyny	Gender - General	2/214	0.935
+Jew ShirIsActually there came a point where men (boys actually) had to be actively taught by Feminist teachers how to be hurt by stereotypes. And statistically the main thing embracing equal rights for women advances is the economic productivity of a society. I cannot think of too many human rights that were advanced for men, by Feminism. If anything, we had to give ground. Consider the work world for specific example. Men as a group have no social identity or value unless they use the proverbial sweat of their brow to provision and support the primary evolutionary purpose of our species, to procreate. And if they didn't do this, they had negative identity and value in the eyes of society and the law. Women are endemically born with identity and value both socially and legally. They don't have to work for it. And I don't think a lot of women realize that when they "augment" their value and identity by becoming a provisioner of others, that makes it harder for a man to establish their primary social and legal identity. There is not one thing about a man's social and legal identity that cannot be taken from them by a woman . But a woman's social and legal identity cannot be taken from them by any man. Hotpink51 I haven't had time to read the replies but i did have a thought about when people say feminism is about equality... it isn't about equality, egalitarian is equality. from what other people say and do, i see feminism as a social cancerous cult that put women above men in a crisis and other minor situations. society throughout the world is pretty feminist.for committing the same crime, men get more jail time, more men than women are homeless, more men than women suffer with mental health because there is more help for women, in the usa there are countless more help centers for women who are victims/survivors of domestics, female genital mutilation is not allowed but the equally dangerous and mostly unneeded removal of baby boys foreskin is very legal and sadly quite popular, the courts tend to side more with the mothers when families separate than the fathers even though the majority of father are just as good a parent as the mothers but are seen as less important, thus leading to mental health with very little help.... the list goes on... that's why i am anti feminist and why i am egalitarian. Tbf, in Emma Stone's and Scarlett Johanson's cases, the questions are still stupid, but there's not much to ask them about their characters. Black Widow is the most underdeveloped character in the Avengers. She barely has any screen time and there's not much to her character. RDJ's Tony Stark, on the other hand, is one of the main characters in all of the Avengers movies. He's constantly leading them and has much more development and much more personality. His character is overall much more interesting.I doubt it had anything to do with the fact that they're women. As much as I hate when people are openly sexist whether it's against men or women. But, one thing that bothered me about a few of these situation is that some of these questions weren't gender specific in a sexist way, because yes it may be only women that are asked these questions, but it's more because they better apply or sometimes only apply. But I do agree the phone vs makeup one was kinda messed up. But a fairly good example in terms of my point is Scarlett Johansson, now I am as excited for the eventual black widow movie as anyone, but a question about under garments just doesn't apply to an armoured war suit (iron man), or a military tactical out fit such as Cap. So I feel that while the question was a bit odd it wasn't sexist. But maybe I was missing the point, because her costume is very skin tight, and well so Is Spidermans and that's all I can think of at the moment. But yeah for the most part I could see the sexism in several of these questions, just some of the reactions may have been a bit extreme, but then again I don't get offended easy so that might just be me, been going on for way to long so I should probably end this and maybe delete it, but no... No, it isn't - because it is a question that is only EVER asked of WOMEN, not of the male actors. Meaning that the journalists always assume that it is the WOMAN that has to juggle her acting career and her personal life (family), while the male actors just leave it up to their girlfriends/wives to handle everything, because that's the woman's "job". Hence, the sexism in the question. If BOTH sexes always got asked that question, then no, it wouldn't be a big deal, but it is NEVER asked of men, only of women. MysticalKatGaming Exactly. I've also noticed that sexism towards men can be overlooked because it's usually different than sexism towards women. Sexism towards women is generally seen as women being paid less because of their sex or looked down upon. Sexism towards men tends to be saying things like they "act like a girl" and telling men/boys never to hit women (which implies it's ok to hit other boys, or that it's ok for women to hit men) I always get annoyed when people tell men things like that, because it implies to that women deserve special treatment because we're prettier or built different or whatever. That's actually pretty sexist towards both genders if you think about it. It implies that men can be treated with disrespect, and that women need to be pampered because we're "weaker" or something. (This was not specific to the "don't hit girls thing", because you shouldn't hit either gender , it's just things like that)	Gender, Sex, Sexism	Gender - General	6/159	3.774

I wasn't saying that women were paid less, I was just saying that that that is typically what sexism towards women is seen as, so it didn't offend me. I also know that women are not built to be as strong, which was why I said I ment things like that, like when people say boys shouldn't cry because that would be "acting like a sissy " which implies that girls are allowed to cry, but boys can't. MysticalKatGaming Yes but there are men who are either weaker then women or other men so if you take that into consideration then you can say that women can be stronger but science and biology prooves men are stronger. And to this women and men look at men saying they must be stronger, manlier, and all that other stuff which is also why weaker men are looked down upon and if they aren't like stereotypical men ideals then they aren't men. Stewart Ndung'u Most people think about how women are always offended and they don't get respect. When you exploit your self, oversexualise your self and, by your behavior, sell your dignity, how can you blame others for pointing it out?? let's pick a female character, let's say Black Widow: It is based on tight leather suit, slick moves and close up to the breasts and ass, and on the ways she can use beauty to her advantage. No character development, unlike Iron Man I.e that goes through hardships and life and death scenarios. So let's stop being politically correct, and let's think critically. ;)	Black	Ethnicity - Black	1/104	0.962
i fail to see why, in these cases, sexuality (sth natural and common) should be punished with sexism . Chris hemsworth has to purposefully display his amazing body during Thor, yet he is never shamed for it. The only uncomfortable and problematic thing about this reality, would be that women in comics were oversexualized by men for men	Common, Sexism	Gender - General, Social Class - Working class	2/57	3.509

I think it's ok if they are choosing to sexualize themselves but if someone is asking them about their underwear in an interview- that's extremely sexist. But it still might promote sexism if, for example, a movie shows men being stronger than women.	Sexism	Gender - General	1/43	2.326
King Jargle The Bold No, it's not sexist. Maybe inappropriate, but nowhere near sexist. If they show almost all of their breasts on camera what do they expect? Character development questions? It's like waiting for a porn movie to end to see if the couple that was fucking will live a happy ever after... There is no character development... Cat woman: Went crazy - end of story. Stayed crazy till the end. Black Widow: Cold killing machine -> little less cold killing machine that has feelings for Hulk... I mean there isn't something interesting... Also singers: When they make songs about fucking (I.e Arianna Grande - side to side (and many more)) why do they not expect questions near sex ? I mean they don't ask Bruce Dickinson sex questions because his songs do not have naked men or women and are not about fucking! It's simple... Women profit when they show their sexy parts, but are offended when someone points it out. No sexism . Straight complex. Dimitris Invictus but that's my point- catwoman, black widow etc did not choose to be displaying their cleavage and wear skin tight suits. They were imagined like that by men, that's the issue. But films now try to somewhat do justice. I'm not a huge DC fan but being a Marvel addict I can guarantee you that Natasha's story is not just assassinations and feelings for hulk. Even in the comics that started this controversy, she is very well developed and has so much more to be discussed in interviews, like her past with bucky barnes and how she felt about it in Winter Soldier, or even sth general like how crazy does it feel to all of a sudden be in the middle of a cosmic war without having any special powers like most of the other avengers. There are plenty of topics to draw from, the interviewers just choose not to. And if we're honest, jeremy renner's part in the avengers is way smaller but he was never asked questions about his underwear. And as someone said above, the ideal is to be able to express your sexuality through your appearance or your work if you want, without being shamed for it. And this just does not happen, not just for women (but especially, since female sexuality seems to be far more triggering, still)	Black, Crazy	Ethnicity - Black, Physical Identity - Physical (and Mental) Impairments	2/226	0.885

L ne Oh yes they did choose it... If they didn't want to wear these suits they could just say no to the part and look for something else. Just to be clear I do not justify the rudeness behind the reporter's questions... I just find it hypocritical to be offended, when most of the character is based in beauty and/or sexiness. I remember an interview where Chris Hemsworth was asked about his training and fitness drill (smthng related to how he got his muscles) and he just answered. Now that wasn't sexist right? We have become too politically correct that we get offended by anything. And yes black Widow might have a lot of story in the comics... Dimitris Invictus yes, I agree with a lot of what you're saying. People should create not just strong female characters with character development, but a different character- not just the go-to strong independent woman who ends up getting with the male lead that I've come to see in almost every movie. But many men have made songs about sex and I haven't seen a single one been interviewed with questions like what these women were being asked. Sam Penrose spoken like a true misogynist .	Misogynist	Gender - General	1/7	14.286

Sarah Glover, men being asked questions about their looks isn't sexist. It's sexist when done towards women because there is an inherent bias women as a group experience in society that leads to those questions being SPECIFICALLY aimed at women. Our culture inherently sees women as sex objects (where bodies are valued, more than intelligence) while men as a group have never been seen as objects, as the male sex. Men's status as human beings is/has always been seen as the creator/leader/jack of all trades (men are the leaders of the culture, and it has been structured to serve men), which means they can be seen as sexual, physically attractive AND capable of being human and at the forefront of society, while women have not been granted the same privilege. The personhood of the male sex has never been a question. For women, sexual objectification is literal, whereas men have been socially taught (and constantly reaffirmed by the media, politics, and every other societal institution) that women aren't equal, but rather secondary tools that can be used and exploited and here for their advantage. That is why those comments are sexist towards women. It is not sexist towards men, ever. That's not what sexism is or how it functions in society.	Sex, Sexism, Sexual	Gender - General	6/211	2.844
Ok, these specific questions aren't sexist towards men, but there are people who have asked men, usually as a celebrity or sports player, sexist questions. I agree on what you're saying in a whole, but I also believe that even if a question isn't seen as sexist if it's about a man's looks or like, 'what they did to get fit for their role' or whatever (like so many actresses have been asked), it is still a sexist question. It is obvious that men get asked the more serious questions and women get asked about their outfit, which is also obviously sexist, but if the questions were switched to the men getting asked about their outfits and the women are asked the deeper questions, then good for the women because they're finally being seen as serious people rather than someone who doesn't know anything except about what they're wearing; but then how is that not being 'sexist' or whatever towards the male? If we're looking for equality, even if what I'm saying doesn't make sense or it's not a real example of sexism towards men, then the simplest way to put it is for interviewers to just stop asking stupid questions and give everyone a chance to answer a more "difficult" question or something that they need a better developed answer than just having to say who they are/aren't dating or what they're wearing... It of course sounds simpler than it really is, and I may just be completely stupid in how 'sexism works' so, sorry but that's just how I think.....	Sexism	Gender - General	1/262	0.382

N Corp, personally I don't agree that men can never be objectified or discriminated against. In fact many have begun to be objectified by women as modern society has also been putting pressure on men to look a certain way and to live a lifestyle where they make a decent income "to be attractive to women." Which is sexism at It's very core and is a mirror image of what has been happening to women for centuries; to look a certain way and to act a certain way to appeal to a man's preference.While I don't deny that society is geared to favour men in some ways, it is simply untrue to say that men cannot be objectified or be subject to sexism from both women and the media.The real problem here is societies emphasis on superficial qualities such as appearance, weight, race , income and feeling the need to stereotype and categorize everything. Rather than teaching everyone to focus on qualities that matter such as the personality of the individual, their intelligence and skills, and being able to treat others with kindness and respect regardless of external factors. In other words, society should be geared towards seeing people as individuals, not as a mass to be pressured into looking the same, thinking the same and following a certain lifestyle because it's what someone else wants in a person. Nine out of ten are indeed incorrect. These reporters asked unfair and sexist questions. Hats off for the witty answers! Number ten, the Serena Williams one on the other hand is off the rails. She played against women exclusively, and had all those great results in competitions where men were excluded from. Take a hint from chess: there are open tournaments, which means anybody (men and women alike) can attend. When a woman wins such a tournament, she will be called the best player of the event (not the best female player). E.g., Judit Polgár or Hou Yifan were/are regularly invited to top open tournaments, because they were/are among the best chess players in the world. The world champion is Magnus Carlsen, because he won the series for the OPEN title. He is not the man world champion, he is the world champion. There is no such thing as man world champion, and nobody calls Magnus Carlsen the best male chess player. There is however a title called " woman world champion". I don't care who the woman world champion is, because that title is meaningless, and in my opinion, offensive to women. Hou Yifan expressed the same opinion when she rejected to fight for that title. If Serena Williams is offended to be called one of the best female athletes of all time, then she should take a leaf out of Judit Polgár's and Hou Yifan's book, and compete against all tennis players, regardless of their gender . i agree that calling a lot of this " sexism " is way out of bounds. most of it is just disrespectful or a little insulting (also situational, considering yeah men get asked about workouts a lot and there is no harm in asking natasha, but at that particular panel i believe she was a bit surprised that the questions were very deep and insightful but once they got to her, they weren't seep and insightful anymore, instead basic and frivolous.) in fact, interviews are hardly the place to look if we want to find good examples of classic hollywood sexism . this video was probably spurred on by the maker seeing a few of these scenarios of simple rudeness on the interviewers part of not knowing when to stop or what isn't appropriate (because the interviewer, like the maker of this video, just wants money and they need drama for money.) so they made a video. Anthony Hanham Why do you think? Sexism is definitely not as prominent in Male culture. There are expectations, but men dont get catcalled, men arent expected to wear long sleeve shirts and pants to cover their body because it could be considered "distracting," and men arent constantly put into uncomfortable situations that focus on body rather than personality. To be a feminist means to stand up for gender equality. Men get asked sexist questions during talk shows? Yes, it's true. And it's still unfair (even if it happens more often with women, as you can notice when RDJ was asked the interesting question about his potrayed character development, while Scar Jo got asked about her diet). Everyone which thinks men and women are equal should define themselves as feminist.	Gender	Gender - General	1/71	1.408
Are you serious? Removal of urinals in men's toilets is why feminism is a bad thing?So you're okay with women being overly sexualixed in spots, in TV shows and movies? With women getting paid less than men in almost ANY job ever (even as actresses)? With guilt being put on them when they get raped? You're okay with the fact that a woman which wears a miniskirt "asked for it", and with the fact that a man isn't allowed to cry in public, or he gets called "a faggot "? You're okay with women being told to "get to the kitchen" (because it's not just a joke, it's a real thing), as if they could do nothing with their lives but being amost slaves for their male partners? You're okay with women getting catcalled, and no one doing anything to save them the humiliation of being yelled "yo, nice tits!" ?And I suppose you're also okay with the fact that the expression "teen dad" doesn't exist, that if a woman gives birth under 18 years old is automatically a slut, and with all the unequal treatments women (and men) receive daily. There are so called "feminists" which are batshit crazy and plain idiotic, as there are stupid people of all kind, race , sex , beliefs, religion and literally everything, but this doesn't mean that /all feminists (and overall feminism) are bad for the world. orton cap You should know that undergarments women wear have these wires and strap that you could see through the fold and wrinkles of the clothes we wear, especially tight clothes. This is the reason why women's swimwear has pockets for bra pads instead- so we don't have to wear undergarments. If you find a woman in a diving suit, you would not ask about their undergarment if you know this fact, or even call her a bitch. It's the same with the actors in movie, it's their costume- they need to fill in a role, to be not only the eye candy but a character with a story. So, calling the actress a bitch because of their costume? That's just plain idiotic and you better regret it	Woman	Gender - General	1/128	0.781
orton cap Swimsuits are skintight so it will not hinder your movements. Swimming while wearing one that's not skintight is even more dangerous since it will only float up and reveal everything under it. Of course it will be different if you are talking about bikinis and all that, but I have to say that's different, because here I'm not talking about dressing up to catch attention. I'm talking about dressing up for occupation- mind you, it's not like prostitution, the actress doesn't violate any morality. Scarlett Johanson here is dress up for the movie and the action, it's not like she is filming porn. They don't even emphasize her private parts! You are calling her a bitch just because her costume is skintight? Excuse you, Ryan Renold wore a skintight suit in Deadpool and even have his butt shot on the camera plenty of times, I see no one shaming him as a fuckboy. orton cap dude, men doesn't have to worry about their swimsuit floating up becaise they don't have breast. And I'm not saying they are an idiot. If you do research THERE ARE REASONS WHY SPORTSWEAR ARE SKINTIGHT FOR WOMEN. Here is some problems I have encountered when I use a loose pants while doing gymnastic. There are some movements where you need to lift your legs straight up pointing to the sky, and what happened? We reveal all those tights, that all adult said to all girls not appropriate to do. Men doesn't have to worry about revealing their chest or their tights, the only private thing there is to hide is the buldges between the leg. And when it's for profesional use, EVEN MEN WEAR SKINTIGHT CLOTHES; FIGURE SKATING, DANCERS, YOGA, TRAPEZE, THERES A LOT. The real profesonal USE the skintight uniform because those are DESIGNED for the sports they are doing. There are sience, calculation, and reasons behind every design, to make the movemnt clear to deliver, to make it lighter to use, to make it easier to move, that doesn't apply only to women! If a woman wears a super thight clothes and plays basketball, okay that's weird. But have you ever seen a woman wearing a shirt while doing figure skating during their competition? Mind you, it's not comfortable wearing skintight uniform because they are not exactly designed to keep them warm, but they need to wear it to emphasize the movement and decrease the weight.	Weird, Woman	Gender - General, Physical Identity - Physical (and Mental) Impairments	3/250	1.2

A good example of a really bad actress when it comes to having a bad attitude and a bad attitude towards men and a bad attitude towards sexuality I don't know the the woman's name she's on Shameless Fiona the character she does sex scenes and she's a little apprehensive and you can see it comes through that she's apprehensive but she does do them her sister on the show she is such an angry woman she is just Venom just a walking Fist and it comes through on the screen and I know that she just turned 18 and I know that they wanted to do sex scenes but she's like dead set against doing them and the show is like all the female characters have to do sex scenes I mean it's part of the show and several of them have been pulling away and defiant won't do the sex scenes and they've been losing air time because of this and this girl and I really hate that I can't remember the name of the character Debbie Debbie is the name of the character I think that they're going to write her off in like send her away on the show because she really is so hostile and they're saying you know we've got to do sex scenes you know we've been waiting and you know and she's like adamant that she's not going to do them so that's that's a good example of a really bad actress and not being true to your craft and not being true to your fellow actors and actressesAnd to see girls so young and so angry at men and at their own sexuality that's really troubling because you know that there going to be a nightmare to work with and to be around and directors and people in charge of casting they need to I'm sure they know this but they need to be very careful if they're casting somebody like this because it's just a symptom of a larger personality problem and you can find somebody else who's not going to be a problem	Sex, Woman	Gender - General	6/354	1.695

Scarlett Johansson the reason that they ask that question and many people said you know what was her special power because she didn't have a special power and most of the time they put women in is window dressing and so that men will have the box to check you know for these action movies that I really do not like the fact that you've got all these explosions and these ridiculous car chases and it's basically a video game that goes on for an hour and a half and it's not entertainment it's not there's no there's no plot to it and one of the boxes that they always have to check is putting some sexy woman in a roll but then covering her up and the only thing that you really see is her fake breasts but even those are covered up with armor or some type of a thick jumpsuit and it's not entertaining for me to watch because there isn't a plot and it's not a good storyNow Deadpool that was a great movie and I did not watch it for a long time I was very much adamant that it was going to suck and it was just another one of these hour-and-a-half-long video game type movies where it's just car chase and explosion but the acting was really good and not just Deadpool but the female weed who is now in Gotham she did an amazing job and she was a great actress and she did the sex scenes and did them pretty well there was some hesitation in the final scenes and I think that's the biggest thing between a really good actress and an actress who isn't true to her craft when I see actresses like Nicole Kidman who does nudity because it's part of your crafts and does not try to hide the nudity that's really important in being a good actor or actress and so many actresses don't do the scenes and they don't do them well and it shows and it's it makes the movie not very goodRight now I've been watching this series Here and Now and it's a good show it's on HBO but they have no nudity they keep saying that there's nudity but there's no nudity it's pixelated out or digitally mast and I think why even do the scenes when you're going to do this you've got all these women and they're not doing nudity they're faking doing nudity and it just Rex those scenes and I don't know why because Holly Hunter is not the type of woman who used to do this so I really don't understand why there's so few actresses that do nude scenes and do them well but when I see an actress who's not afraid of her sexuality and not afraid to be nude I have a great deal of respect for those womenLucy Liu is another actress who is a great actress and she's a great actress not just because she's a good actor but also because she's not afraid to do nudityI recently purchased several photos that she did under an assumed name and there was nudity and she uses the money to fund one of her projects I think it's a charity and I thought how amazing is this woman that she does this it just made me respect her even moreAnd women take compliments the wrong way you know when someone goes to a guy and says you know you've got really great muscles and you've got really great nipples you know but they call them packs or whatever and if a woman has really great breasts and really great nipples and so few women have great breasts in great nipples most of them have fake breasts and they don't look very good when a woman gets a compliment like that I guess it depends on who's making the compliment but if a guy is sincere and he says you know that you	Sex, Woman	Gender - General	7/1039	0.674

I agree these are lame questions. But, there's some that (to be fair) are only considered sexist if asked to a woman . The underwear one, for example, I've seen asked to every actor that has played Spider-man. I also remember Ioan Gruffudd having to uncomfortably talk about the size of his dick while in his Fantastic 4 costume, yet no one bats an eye because he's a man. It's an incredibly stupid question, but not restrictive to women. Same goes for diet and exercise, which I've seen asked to Henry Cavill, Hugh Jackman, Chris Pratt, etc. Also, consider what articles you click before damming every interviewer as an idiot. If you chose a headline telling you how to get in Scarlet Johanson's shape over Black Widow's character development, remember you are also determining the type of questions she'll be asked in the future. These journalists have a job too, and as amazing as it might be to write about the complexities of a character, if their article gets no clicks, they'll be forced to ask shallow questions. "Feminism is no longer a dirty word." I'd say that it is now more than ever. The radical "feminists" (those commonly known as feminazis) have stained the reputation of the word with lies, false statistics, and the demonization of men. So much so that a lot of people who do agree with the central premise, that men and women should be equal, won't call themselves feminists, because they don't want to be associated with third wave idiots who actually believe there is still a wage gap caused by patriarchy and that 3 out of 4 women on Earth will be sexually assaulted (these are some of the prior mentioned false statistics). OK! on the Serena Williams response. YOU HAVE to define her as one of the greatest FEMALE players because she would be unable to beat the top men there fore she cannot be the best tennis player you can only call someone the best in their sport when there is no need for segregation in that sport. to say that she is the greatest tennis play would mean that she would have to be better than rodger federer or rod laver or margaret court or billie jean king. you can determine against billie jean king and margaret court because you can look at the progression in womens tennis and see how they have changed. even so it is still a difficult call between margaret court, Evonne Goolagong Cawley and serena williams. therefore their comment on her being the greatest womens player is the only claim they can try to make.On the kiera knightly response. First of all, third wave feminism has been so idiotic and dumb , a lot of women also go against this kind of feminism. If you actually look at what people are doing, you can clearly see how third wave feminism is just garbage. You have women trying to get rid of men, making women the 'powerful' gender (I don't care about gender and sex), and trying to destroy all equalities and only help the women. Second of all, you need to be more mature and not appear as if you were a 2 year old . Gotta love all those precious little manchildren being up in arms about "third wave feminism is about female supremacy!!".Ahem, the women calling themselves feminists and adhering to a thought process where one gender should rule the other, are called RADICAL feminists. They are pariah.Most of them, are no such thing. And guess what? FEMINISTS are far more helpful to matters of male rights as well. The male shelter I sought protection from once, was run by a feminist political party. Meanwhile, the MALE SUPREMACY movement is gaining ground, MGTOW, Incels, MRA... All of them masking themselves as being about protecting men from oppression, but in reality they're all about hatred, seeking to oppress women once more, making up bullshit and radicalizing young men to their cause. Incels have already begun stacking bodies in their wake. But yeah, "third wave feminism" is for sure a threat to all us males. It's not as if EVERY single wave of feminism had delicate manchildren becoming paranoid. Meanwhile, women have played the role of oppressors to men exactly hmmm let's see here... zero times! Males are still overrepresented in just about every ruling position, yet somehow it's WOMEN that are a problem? CrystalCritter There are little things called jokes you know. Maybe if you stopped getting offended by everything, you'd get a hint. Also, the way certain feminists are treating men, you can kind of relate them to the early stages of nazism. When the war was just starting and Hitler recently gained power, the nazis weren't mainly about killing innocents yet. That was maybe around the mid 1940s. Instead, they were more about shaming and discouraging Jews. Now, if you replace Nazi with feminists and Jews with cis white males, you'd see a slight similarity. Feminists bash and harass the 'privileged white men' when they earn more money than them, just like the nazis with Jews. I'm not saying they're identical that the feminists cause manslaughter, but I'm saying some feminists share similar early Nazi ideologies but with different people. No, i don't agree with all these examples. I don't understand why the Kiera Nightly's question was sexist. Also, superhero actors are asked all the time how they got in shape for a role, not only that, but before and after picks are common place too. Selfies are about female power. What? Lastly, I believe the Mad Max question is taken out of context. Its like not being true to source material. Just like James Bond being black . Will Smith playing the role of James West. Source material. The guy did feel strongly about this, but it is just a movie, and he needs to stop taking fictional seriously. BTW, Amy Schumer is absolutely gross and without any class whatsoever. In 1998 Serena Williams and her sister was beaten by a man, Karsten Braasch (ranked 203). She does not compete against men on normal circumstance and (to my knowledge) hasn't since. "Athlete" is genderless (a person who is proficient in sports and other forms of physical exercise). So when comparing Athletes, we need to compare their proficiency to all other Athletes. If she can obtain those achievements compared to others regardless of gender then she would be considered "One of the greatest" of that word (Athlete). Since she does not compete against a certain form of those Athletes (males), that claim will have an asterisk (*), which would stand for "female". So considering that, how is it sexist to ask what it's like to be one of the greatest female athletes? Looking for an actual answer here, I'm willing to retract my comment if a logical answer is found. I agree that women in general need to learn to speak more frankly, if for no other reason so people can't use vagueness as an excuse to keep harassing them. However, considering the interviewer was also the guy who didn't accept Scarlet Johansson not wanting to talk about her underwear, yeah, I'm inclined to call this a case of sexism . the interview had alot of sexism in it i watched the whole thing..And he was trying to come up with things a girl would have trouble choosing between, which is offensive. Seriously i rarely wear makeup and almost half of my life was spent without a cellphone.	Sexism	Gender - General	1/47	2.128

Kat i am confused... are you implying that we females do these things? cause many don't. many american women don't. they just aren't in the spotlight; they are walking down the street or working in a local store. maybe i have misunderstood this comment, but if you are implying that women (specifically western women as you mentioned) do all these things (100 accessories, heels, stripes, yoga, obsessing) is what i would qualify as sexist. now, this video has a lot of things that aren't sexist, just vaguely insulting or imply frivolity. but your comment reinstates the same false notion that women are constantly body obsessed. while i usually don't like to use personal experience as examples, i will say that i don't do much of any of that. i don't wear jewelry or deliberately buy clothes that make me more attractive to men. i buy clothes that make me smile, are comfortable and cute but could still be worn in a business atmosphere. i care about my appearance and wear makeup in professional settings cause i am aware that light makeup and a general care for appearance is necessary for a woman to succeed in this society. damn, for anyone to succeed.i like to think that if it weren't for these centuries old practices of pampering women and emphasizing their beauty above all throughout their entire youth would result in women being less self conscious and worried over how they look to their peers.	Old, Woman	Age - Over 65s, Gender - General	2/245	0.816
+B. Nikolai KramerThere is no way you're serious. I've never seen such a dishonest comment in my life.Is it sexist to say that the majority of sports players are male?Is it sexist to say that the majority of makeup buyers are female?is it sexist to say that the majority of STEM field graduates are male?Is it sexist to say that the majority of people that frequently buy accessories are female?It's the truth for goodness sake. Nobody is claiming that EVERYBODY does all these things, but it is safe to assume that they most like do these things. It's not sexist to assume that a woman has more makeup than the average guy, it's not sexist to assume women spend more money on clothes than guys, it's not sexist to assume that a woman probably didn't engage in any sport as a child/teenager.Making these assumptions you're most likely going to be correct. It's not sexist in any fucking way, judging people by their gender and what they most commonly do is a basic deduction. Of course, you could always be wrong, and there's nothing wrong with not using makeup or buying a shit ton of clothes. That's fine. I am an actress wearing a really tight overly sexualized skimpy outfit that has been plaguing the comic book genre characters for eons; having chosen this acting role I find it offensive to talk about my body or anything related to my figure that I stick in your face in a movie for 2 hrs. I would instead like to answer character development and what was the mental state that led to a character wearing such a costume. As a female, I can say that it shouldn't be offensive if a woman is asked how she balances her family life and career more than a man. Mainly, because women's personal space tends to be invaded more by the press, hence why they're asked how hard it is to have private lives. Also, for mothers, they naturally have more responsibilities (i.e. breastfeeding) that can leave them in a vulnerable position for the paparazzi. I agree with Kiera when she asked her follow up questions to that being asked of her but instantly when they said they would ask the males that question, it became an average, non-sexist, harmless query that is just standard for an interviewer. That's actually wrong tho. A lot of interviewers do ask about exercises BUT to have a body like they have exercising isn't enough. Only 30 of it is exercising, the remaining 70 of it is very strict dieting. A lot of people go to the gym thinking that if they go to the gym they can eat whatever they want, but that's just plain ignorance. The most important thing they do to have those supermodel and Hollywood bodies is dieting. You can work out all you want but if you have bad eating habits then those types of bodies are impossible to achieve. When asked those questions about exercising most actors actually mention how important their diet is and how it's the worst part of their training, having to eat measured amounts of specific foods and not being able to eat what they really like to eat.Also, exercising doesn't really make you lose weight, past a certain point you'll start gaining weight, cause muscle weights more than fat .And yes, unlike men, women don't really have to work out that much to be considered "hot", most of what they do is dieting, which is still terrible if you're a person who likes to eat.	Fat	Physical Identity - Physical Features	1/205	0.488
Many of these questions are asked not based on sexism , but based on what the audience wants asked. We don't ask men about their dieting regimen unless they look like The Rock, because usually women are the ones who work the most on their appearance. And asking any celebrity living today which one matters most, their phone or their makeup, is not sexist, considering she had both on her and usually does.	Sexism	Gender - General	1/72	1.389

MrBluePants I agree. No one should be put into an uncomfortable position like that. Doesn't matter what gender it's wrong. The point of the video isn't that men don't suffer from sexism ; the point is that these women do. Period. Why bring outside sources that have absolutely nothing to do with the video in? Yes, encouraging a male to take off his shirt and leaving a women alone would be sexist, though let's be real, there's more stigma around asking a woman to undress than a male, which leads back to the fact that women's bodies are somehow considered more 'shameful' than males. Why? Because we have boobs? It's not our fault people can't keep it in their pants and bust a nut any time boobs are shown on screen. So, your comment doesn't really do anything but show your desperation to defend someone's ignorance when it comes to these situations. I do agree with you that men shouldn't be catcalled every time they take off their shirt, but women don't even get a chance to take off their shirts because it's somehow 'terrible' because oh no, Mother Nature exists and she gave women boobs. Theheavenlysin666 I'll go ahead and admit myself that there were one or two I raised an eyebrow at, but the two you've pointed out were indeed sexist. You're looking at it from the perspective of what the questions say rather than who they're directed towards. The latter is where the problem comes in. Oftentimes, such as in the one with RDJ and Scar Jo, the men are given interesting questions concerning the development of their characters or the content of their music. With the women, however, the questions center more around what they're wearing, what their characters are wearing, how they look. That's not to say men don't get that as well, as I, personally, do not know. I just know women suffer from that. Let me ask you something. If you were, say, an athlete, and you dedicated your entire life to being an athlete, only to go in an interview for a huge game you won, wouldn't it frustrate you just a little bit if the only questions you got weren't even about the game? If they were about how your sports uniform fits, or who made it, instead of the plays you made and how hard you worked to train for this specific game, would it not annoy you at least a bit? Maybe not, but for a lot of people, it is annoying, these women in particular. That is why those questions have been labeled sexist; the exact wording of them had little to nothing to do with it. I'm not sure if you understand me, and if needed, I can try to put it in another way, but I ask you to try and see it from their perspective instead of your own.	Nothing	Age - Youngsters	1/289	0.346

Tonne Fan Yes, and I did bring that point up when saying that people seem to be incapable of keeping it in their pants when they see a woman naked; however, men's bodies are attractive too, or at least those with nice ones. Same for women. Most people aren't attracted to women who don't have bodies that match today's beauty standards, and the same goes for men. I don't know if you've noticed, but my reply was addressing the point previous commenters brought up, which was that men are faced with sexism too including being encouraged to take their shirts off, and that is why I brought up the fact that women's bodies are consider shameful. I can't quite explain it as well as I would like to in a simple YouTube comment, but I don't get why women are punished for having attractive bodies when there are plenty of men who also have attractive bodies. I'll be the first to agree with you because I find women's bodies beyond attractive, but some people find men's bodies attractive. So, what's different? The fact that most cultures are formed from a male dominant society is what. I'm not usually one for what I called feminazi propaganda, but women are forced to cover up because men can't handle being around an attractive woman . Period. This is unfair to both men and women in my opinion because, once more referencing a previous comment, men are encouraged to take their shirts off and leered at by women (and other men, but for the sake of simplicity I'm speaking about a heterosexual audience) as if it's okay when it's not. Women feel uncomfortable when men leer at them, so men have a right to feel uncomfortable when women leer at them. Now, I can't say for sure that they are because I'm not a male, but a lot of these people love to talk about equality, and well, it's not really equal. the rest are awesome, but i dont understand and i am a fashion student, why some women are getting so offended by "who are you wearing tonight?". like its the oscars, youre dressed to the nines probably in a beautiful hand made custom for you gown with hand embroidery or beading. alot of work goes into that dress that you are wearing. once you are at awards season you should have sold your movie by now in the amount of press junkets etc. youve sold the producers movie now you sell the designers dress. if you dont want to be asked the question dont walk the red carpet, by definition that is what it is there for. to have your picture taken in the dress and talk about the designer that spent hours and hundreds of dollars to try and make you look presentable for your big night. have some fucking respect.	Red	Ideological and Political Identity - General, Ethnicity - Native-American	2/152	1.316
I wonder if people will ever stop thinking they are always right. The reason women are treated so differently sometimes is because physically, men are built stronger (I'm not saying women can't be stronger than men) and a while back then being strong mattered, and it still does today, but not nearly as much, which is why women used to be in the kitchen and teaching, men were doing things that required strength (once again, not saying that women can't be strong but I'm going off of averages). Now that more jobs are related to intelligence than strength, women are equal in qualification. (Btw the wage gap is kind of bs and that's a fact, actually research it if you think it exists) But sadly many women are complaining about something that had nothing to do with them or pretty much any of the men they might know, sure maybe they are being treated unfairly by some dickhead they met on the street, but if that hurts your feelings enough to waste someone's time and complain, you need to check your priorities and realize that you shouldn't give a fuck about someone else's feelings. In short, learn to take a rude comment, just like EVERYONE does, not just women. Also almost none of these questions were sexist, for example "what's your diet?," in what fucking way is that sexist, if I walked up to a women right now and I asked what's your diet, does that make me a sexist? Fuck no, also "what's your favorite position," that's not sexist, if anything it's slightly perverted but not sexist, I guess it's time for me to realize that this won't change anyone's mind and people calling themselves feminists (bad name btw) should just learn to be ok with their own life, and not 'Fix' others.	Nothing	Age - Youngsters	1/304	0.329

CoolCat First I think you have to learn about sexism . I'm sure you'll find some good facts in Google. Then we'll break it down	Sexism	Gender - General	1/24	4.167

CoolCat Well, it's about what interviewers focus on, what they think is the most important or most significant to ask at that moment. It's a shallow question that could be thrown at for example Tom Hardy, but most dudes are taken too seriously to even get that kind of questions. If he says "can we talk about my role instead? The reporter would likely say "oh yeah of course, I guess there are moee important things to focus on". If it's a girl saying "hey let's not focus on that right now", they will often try again and again to get their question answered because some feel like they can't take a no as an answer from a woman . It's also the notion that women always should be super focused on dieting and teaching her lady followers how to live a fit and glam life. Some are totally not interested in that and besides, I don't think that many are that interested in reading about it in for example a movie magazine.	Woman	Gender - General	1/172	0.581
ELFM 2: Electric Boogaloo I swear I read "menstruation" and thought this would be a popcorn worthy thread. Sigh. Also, to the original question, no, nobody can. Not logically, at any rate.	Nobody	Age - Youngsters	1/32	3.125
For a lot of these, context is key. Hardly any (well, aside from the underwear one and Helen Mirren's) are obviously sexist, but because these questions are largely pointed at women, and only women, and because when women try to answer shortly and/or change the subject the interviewer will just ask again and more insistingly, that makes those questions sexist. So no, if you ask one of your girl friends about her fitness routine, that's not sexist. If you insist on asking even when she's not interested in telling you, that's being an asshole. If you insist on asking her but you would accept a "Oi, dude, please stop this line of questioning already" from a man, then it's sexist. If you ask a girl friend about her make up or cell phone, it's not sexist. If you insist that that's the only interests she could possibly have because she's a woman ? Yeah. Wonder of wonder, that's sexist. I mean, it's not rocket science, this?	Woman	Gender - General	1/165	0.606
I believe the one posed to Rowan Blanchard was more out of place than sexist. A little sexist because women mostly get these questions - maybe. But I find it to be awfully out of place to ask a thirteen year old about her diet, because this makes her (and the (likely teenage or younger) viewers think you would need at diet at that age , which, unless there are health concerns, you definitely don't! anime quirks: that one person that always jumps to conclusions. Men are scolded now a days for little pointless things. Men actors get asked the same questions(excluding Rihanna's), but its a slap on the wrist but flip side it's sexist. The question about how she balances her life style and her job is no way sexist just a simple question. But bc a men asked a woman that it's some how offensive. Again if a woman asked that to a man in the same context and environment it's totally normal. So rly men aren't pathetic, but pounded by society for no wrong doing.	Woman	Gender - General	2/104	1.923
Srly. It's not just flip the scenario a woman asking those questions to a man and no one would mind.	Woman	Gender - General	1/20	5.0
Come on, I know some of the questions were too far out, but the celebs themselves must also realize, that they themselves play alot into the culture of hypersexualization. Ariana Grande fx. have to expect, getting sexual questions, when she pertrays herself in a hypersexual way, in both media and Music videos. The same with Scarlet Johanson. If they want a less sexualized culture, they could also change how they pertray themselves, and fx. say no to roles, where they clearly help the hypersexualized culture. If you want to be seen, for who you are as a person, and not how you look, where more baggy clothes. It's the same for men, but it's just a bigger problem for women, due to mens more visually stimulated sexual behavior. If you don't want to awaken the animal in a man, tone down your apperence a bit. I also know that men definately have a part in all of this, probably the biggest, but just remember, that you as a women, also have a responsibility, and can help make it all a bit easier, bc in the end we are all just animals.Regarding the Anne Hathaway case, I think it's a bit more serious, and she definately has a valid point. But she has also herself, chosen to be a part of the public perception, as an actor. Without the public focus, that makes people care about her wardrobe malfunction, they wouldn't Care about her new movie, and therefore she would be jobless. If she cares enough about what she said, she should start maling small indie movies, outside of the general public's sphere. If she did that, there would still be a small group of people that would care, but it would be a lot less, and it would also be a lot more accepting, and non-judgemental, due to the kind of people, who watch those movies. Probably like minded people to herself.Anyway my point is just, look at what you're playing into yourself, and if you want to change the system, start by changing, what you yourself perticipate in. Then the system will also change.	Sexual	Gender - General	2/357	0.56

God this video is bad. Serena Williams once practiced against a man who was ranked 200 in the men’s rankings. They played two games. She only managed to score one point. And she said she would never want to seriously play against men I’m a league. Because men are naturally more athletic. It’s not sexist it’s biology. Get over it. Fuck I’m only 50 seconds into the video. It’s now sexist to say how to you balance a personal and career life? Really? Because I’m in college and have a job. And like the first fuckomg question people ask teachers is how to balance work school and social life. Generally girls ask these questions because they tend to care more about finding a good balance and the guys just say fuck it and scrape by with Cs. So maybe all these girls asking their professors for advice would also love to hear advice from successful women. Somehow that’s sexist lol Jesus fuck. OK well the radio position question yeah that’s a troll being sexist. Also the Scarlett ones. The underwear ones just stupid. Who cares. Dumb question. Not sexist. But the fitness regime. Asking about diet tips to a 13 year old is about the most innocent thing, there are more questionable things than that to ask or teach a child, just search up ” Queer Kids Stuff” or ”Pop n Olly” they are trying to teach kids at a VERY young age things they should have no concern over. I will say they have less of a following than Disney but my statement still stands. About the dieting comment- Do you ever hear an interviewer ask a male actor about the way he dieted or worked out for a role? Unless he was making a workout tape, I'm gonna guess your answer is no. It's not that the question itself was inappropriate, it's the fact that it seems like only women are asked these types of questions. And asking a, at the time probably 16 year old , girl a question about her dieting tips was inappropriate in that moment. Not everyone goes on diets. And asking a girl what her tips on dieting are for OTHER GIRLS is just like implying that other girls are looking for that. As if they're just sitting around wondering and hoping that they can find dieting tips from they're favorite celebrities. Maybe that is the case, but for most people it probably is not. About the objectification of female actresses- It's not the women that are choosing to be objectified. It's society doing that. You see men walking around in movies shirtless in some scenes and no one bats an eye or objectifies them in any way. It's not anyone's fault but your own if you're seeing someone (man or woman) as an object just because they may be showing some skin. And the fact that you see no problem with that kinda scares me. "If Channing Tatum was asked about his figure, I'd imagine it'd be a similar matter." 1) When has any interviewer asked him about his 'figure'?2) In what way would it be a similar matter??3) You are honestly just as sexist as the interviewers in this video even if you don't mean to be	Old, Woman	Age - Over 65s, Gender - General	2/281	0.712

You have got to be kidding cheesebuff. Male actors get asked about their workout routines all the time. I've seen entire articles (based off interviews) about how practically any male in a movie for got physically ready for the role. Chris Hemsworth? Yep. Chris Evans? Yep. Hugh Jackson? Uh huh. Chris Pratt? Yes again. And oh, since you mentioned him let's talk about Channing Tatum for a second. First, yes I've seen him answer questions about how he works out and keeps himself in shape. And since you also seem to believe that male actors are never objectified then how the hell did he star in two movies about freaking male strippers? Two whole movies where the entire point was for the (almost entirely female) audience to stare at good-looking men dancing without much shirts! And guess what, women were definitely batted their eyes. But I guess that can't be objectifying because they're men. Now let's move on to another half-formed thought you had. There is nothing wrong with asking a woman about diet tips for other women. Do you know who usually asks those question? Women's magazines, for women to read about. And they do it for the the same reason they ask men about their workouts; because people realize that they are good looking and want to be like them! And you may not have mentioned it but it's been bugging me since I saw it in the video. When women are asked about the clothes they wear it's not because of men. Men don't really care who made any of the clothes and it's not men that sit around on tv and criticize everyone's choices. Men usually aren't asked about their tuxes/suits either because they all look the same for the most part.	Nothing, Woman	Age - Youngsters, Gender - General	2/296	0.676

Serena Williams should have been sports woman of the year not sportsperson, granted if you have a admirable and likeable personality off court and gain an award for sportsperson due to other factors outside of your sports achievements then fine, but to label her as sportsperson of the year soulfully because of her sporting talents is just wrong simply because any male tennis player would wipe the floor with her, this is not sexist or bias to men etc etc but simply it's fact that any Tom dick or Harry worth his salt on a tennis court would find no trouble in beating Serena William around the court. This is not assuming that she has no talent because in the world of women she is the most talented but when compared to her male counterparts in the sport she would easily be beat. Men also play 5 sets to win while women play 3 sets to win so using that as a platform alone you can make the assumption that the male tennis player would almost automatically be build to win the final 2 sets while women would not, but even then, in a 3 set game for a male tennis player against Serena I would put my house on the male to beat Serena around the court and barely break a sweat	Woman	Gender - General	1/223	0.448

I didn't need to think about it very long to come up with an answer. I said, "her brain". Nobody wanted to accept this because they were all thinking about tits or ass or legs. I explained that I thought an intelligence was the most important trait, to me, when it came to sexiness. Sure a woman with a great body might be fun to fuck, but what about the rest of the time? So to you, there's absolutely no difference between Keira Knightley, Anne Hathaway and Scarlet Johansen (to name a few of the actresses in the video). Estrella Vega That is how the industry is. Hollywood select looks over talent. However, you can't blame these women for playing by the industry rules, rather talented or not. That is how they make their living. It is the industry that needs to change and focus more on talent, but that is not going to happen anytime soon. Also, these women should be spoken to with respect despite what they are wearing. These type of of sexist question perpetuates the steryotype that in order to be famous, one has to be attractive. Additionally, even if these women were to dress conservatively, it will not stop the sexist questions from being asked. An interviewer will still ask what underwear a woman is wearing under her burka if he feel it will be appealing to the audience. Additionally, it could ruin her chances of getting noticed among the more revealing actresses, hindering her from getting a future gig. It does not matter if that female celebrity is talented or not. Furthermore, I personally feel Anne Hathaway is very talented. She is able to play multiple types of roles. It's simply your opinion to think that these women are simply beautiful faces with no talent. However, they still deserve respect for being able to find success in a superficial industry. Whenever someone's behavior, condition, or attitude fosters stereotypes of social roles based on sex , they are acting sexist. Anyone of any political view can be sexist or be called sexist. Demetria I would never consider one person to define an entire movement. That would be like saying the president speaks for the entire country. As a person who has worked in radio, they pushed it. Ariana Grande is a million dollar star, they offended her, and doubled down on offending her. That is how you lose contracts. In terms of WHY it is offensive, since a lot of men in this section seem to not get it, and keep stating "it's not rude"...If you have an intensely successful person in front of you who is a) female and b) a woman of color you can ask things like "what brought you to success" or any real interview question. Instead, what they did was ask her a bunch of basic stuff that puts people on the spot. That might be ok for a white dude in the industry who doesn't have to face a bunch of people trying to unhinge or unseat them all the time but it is NOT OK to do that to someone who faces it often if you want to keep a good reputation as a radio company. Within that offense they implied that she only cares about her phone or her makeup, as if she is a 2D person if she cares about those things. Newsflash that phones keep women safe and makeup keeps you financed. Understanding makeup also keeps her in charge of her own image, which is a big thing for women in entertainment. So they cut down two things that are very important to female entertainers for income and personal safety, they failed to ask any real questions or make her feel comfortable (the literal job of a host, because it gets the person to talk candidly), they offended a star who is known for keeping her cool, and they failed to pick up on her being very uncomfortable, or knew it but continued anyway. They went because he's a cool, good looking guy and he always gets the girl who also happens to be good looking and sexy...that's just the way the movies work people. Go ahead and stop putting these people in the movies. Use only ugly actresses and actors....see what happens to the industry...women just don't get that....men go to see the hot looking woman in the movie (because it's natural) and to be entertained for two hours....women over think things and want to be emotionally involved in the movie which is fine...but if you look at the likes versus the dislikes on this video you will see that more than 25 of people disagree with you. That's a lot of dislikes so you missed the mark a bit. Face it, people get in the movies because they are attractive or have some kind of sex appeal. Live with it and after you get rich and famous because you are sexy and attractive don't try and say "hey, don't look at or talk about my attractiveness" If you didn't want that, you should not have signed on for the job. +Laydie Lie Dipshit. Not so much, both sexes are exploited, it's only an issue when it happens to women. Remember all those wet t-shirt scenes of Scarlett in the Marvel movies? Oh wait, that was Chris in Thor all soaked down and then shirtless. And of course Cap had to do the same. What female avenger did partial nudes? Robert did as well, hmm. Ohhh weird , only the guys but it's a non-issue but if it were the women, people would loose their minds.See the thing is, it's not that it's relevant to the part, it's that such is relevant /to women/. They ask the males questions they think will appeal to men, and the females questions that will appeal to women.I know I know, sexist of me to say hair, clothes, and diets appeal to woman right? Go tell that to Oprah and Dr Oz and well every store everywhere who markets, knowing just what women buy.It's marketing. Is it fucked up? Kindof, yeah, but it's based off of the interests that are overwhelmingly proven constantly day in and day out.Asking the singer what she would be without, makeup or her phone is sexist right? Well open her backpack, because she did not bring a purse right? And I bet she had no makeup in there? But would not put money on it because, not a fan of throwing that away. She can say it's sexist all she wants but pretty much 100 that she was the only one in that room carrying makeup on her so.. The marketing was not wrong.The little girl asked about dieting? First, girls and women pay more attention to dieting than boys, go look at any magazine that advertises to girls or women, ever. Would you ask that of a boy?Yes. In fact we would. If we were talking to some boy who might possibly have some sort of a diet, say a gymnast, weight lifter or runner, we sure would ask him. And he would be happy to tell us, rather than get bitchy and professionally offended about it.	Weird, Woman	Gender - General, Physical Identity - Physical (and Mental) Impairments	2/353	0.567
+J HauptmannYes, both sexes are exploited. But to different degrees.But trying to belittle what is done to women won't make what's done to men any better. If a woman is attacked, people supporting her aren't your enemy just because. Or just because you want to argue the toss on "who has it worse".Your comments here are proof that you are just a child who wants everyone to see everything their way. Newsflash: it ain't all about you.Girls are allowed to ask girls about girly stuff. But when men continually focus on how a woman looks while ignoring every other aspect of what they're SUPPOSED to be talking about - in this case, the movie - while not doing the same thing to the men, it is clear he is being a misogynic ass.Like you.I'm over this. Laydie Lie Yes, both sexes are exploited. But to different degrees.Yes you are right.Women tend to get sympathy, empathy, and help magnitudes more than men on every issue, even issues that happen more to men.But a great example is this video, poor Scarlett asked about her outfit, but ignoring that at least she never had to get mostly undressed and soaked down, several times for close up body arching shots like several of her costars did. In other words, going 'ohhh poor victim' about the person who had it far better, and then everyone going on about how evil it is and exploited she is.What if I said how bad whites had it in the US during the 1920s in the US and how the government did not treat them right. Would be a dumb comment right?Girls are allowed to ask girls about girly stuff. Ohh well that's hella sexist. So if the interviewer had been a woman, then it would have been no problem at all. That's seriously a fucked up sexiest way to see things. "How dare that blackie talk to me that way, only another white may address me thusly."I'm over this. Respond again and I'll mute/block you. J Hauptmann I hope you don't take offense to what I am about to say but...I agree with some of the things she said but I think her attitude and delivery was horrible, she didn't explain her points too well so it sounded like she was being sexist. I think what she meant by initial post is that programs like Dr Oz or Oprah handles various topics and yes the majority of their audience are women However, when it comes to movie promotions, questions have to be at most 20 percent about the movie preparation like diet regimen, workouts and 60 about the MOVIE and the last 20 on the actor/actresses views and conclusion. However, the interviewers regardless of their gender (I don't care If you're a unicorn) focused only on the first part over and over and over and were pushing it to the point of making the actresses feel awkward and uncomfortable. Sure male actors get asked these type of questions but these questions are not dominant in most of their interviews.With that being said, I agree with you 100 on the sexualization of male actors. People tend to only focus on female characters being sexualized in movies and are quick to defend them which is a double standard against men T.T I mean, have you seen how men get ridiculously sexualized in Ellen's show?!! I cringe every time I see that.Sorry for my long rant, my English is not very good but I hope my post is clear to you. Peace <3	Gender	Gender - General	1/259	0.386

This is such a load of shit at best. I'm sure a lot of women do get the creep questions and other crap, good grief people you will not stop until you own reflection in the mirror offends you. This country has to have the most tender and dainty brains. I would be the first to defend a woman or man being messed with, but these over paid assholes have such short fuses it's almost dangerous, anticipating getting pissed off before the question is asked. And to the interviewer talking about workout routines and fitting in costume's; Christian Bale, Ben the-womanizer-Aflact, Henry Cavil all talked about their work out and trying to fit into suit's, what the hell is the issue. But I guess women beautify their eye lids, heighten their look's hours in the bathroom every day just to please themselves? I feel the sexism women experience nowadays is so subtle that it is seemingly overlooked and ignored, but that doesn't mean it's not there. To be fair, plenty of dudes, Chris Hemsworth and Channing Tatum are ones who spring to mind immediately, are regularly asked in interviews what their sort of workout regime is. Sure it's posed to women more often and generally to all women, whereas only certain dudes cop it, but still.Also, the Cate Blanchett thing in the intro? No, of course they don't do that to the guys. The whole point of the red carpet is the fashion and you know what men's red carpet fashion is? Suits in grey, blue, or black , either with a tie or a bowtie. That's it. There's no pretty details or trains, or lacework, or appliqué or sparklies or design intricacies on suits that everyone's interested in seeing. And even if there was, it's unlikely to be all over the suit like it is on gowns. No one is gonna wear a 70,000 dollar gown on the redcarpet if they don't get to show off how beautiful it is, and designers would stop providing gowns if celebs weren't going to show off all that painstaking work.And finally, I've seen PLENTY of interviews with male celebrities where they're asked questions about work/life balance and if they're single, what they're looking for in a partner. God, other than emotional turmoil. guys have it so easy. Ugh! They have no idea! With Rowan Blanchard, it even shows how young girls are ridiculed with sexist comments and conformity. Like, usually men are praised for acting (slightly) arrogant or like a douche, and they hardly have to worry about anything other than their hair and maybe beard, a colonel and deoderant. WOMEN are expected to have perfection, or she will be criticized. We ARE criticized with a fine tooth comb. All the time. And men, when their good features are praised, they get all gushy and show off, or deflect it. There are a bit of double standards there, but men love being objectified because it is the opposite of threatening, it's boosting their ego and masculinity. But for women, it's taking our control, our power away. Because a man does a shirtless scene in his underwear (the vacation), and he's noticed for it, asked about it, all of the above, and he takes it in his stride. I get the correlation between the topics and the account, but having a Mojo and MsMojo almost suggests that Mojo is advertising that these kinds of topics are only of interest to one specific gender - in this case very obviously women, instead of making a statement and saying that this is a topic that should be addressed on a more universal & popular account. Him personally? I doubt it. His viewers? Most likely. Many women probably what to know what she did to get into that cat suit. Why would men? So... is it really "sexist" to ask her? I agree. Honestly, I don't think 'Ms Mojo' should exist in the first place - it's sexist of a channel to presume that a woman would want to watch something different to that of a man (and vice versa). I had the same problem with the 'women's only screenings' of wonder- woman . You don't see all male screenings of Iron Man, for instance, because it's 'acceptable' for women and men to enjoy feature films that praise male strength. Whereas, films like wonder- woman (which attempt to showcase female strength) are marketed instead as 'chick-flicks'. I find that quite upsetting. (But just my opinion).	Woman	Gender - General	1/101	0.99
ASH I don't know about that, it's only natural for men and women to like and watch different things. Like how little boys play with nerf guns and how little girls play with barbies, their specificity designed for one gender . Also big Hollywood movies that focus on action and violence are designed for men's liking and movies like romantic comedies are designed for women's liking, sure women like violence sometimes and men like rom coms sometimes but I'm talking generally not universally, so I think making a channel designed for women's liking is kind of smart. For all the idiots in the comment section who don't seem to understand why dieting and fitness questions directed at women are sexist it's because it's asked in regards to their weight and figure. When a man is asked a question it is typically in regards to their health and lifestyle or stunts done in a movie. For women, it's directed as 'how skinny did you have to get?' or 'how much weight did you have to lose?' Today there is a big disconnect between what people think of feminism and equality. I'm sorry because I can't remember the exact numbers but there was a poll asking people if they believed in gender equality. As expected the answers were almost 100 yes. They then asked the same people if they were feminists. The number of people who said yes dropped drastically. This shows that because of the actions of many 'feminists' a large portion of people no longer view feminism as a fight for equality. And I also don't think that women 'repopulate the earth' on their own lol. Men might just play a role in that too.	Gender	Gender - General	1/110	0.909

Corey, I'm going to suggest that it's not "...the actions of many 'feminists'", but what people perceive those actions to be, partially due to their own bias, rumour, misunderstanding, and the basic drive of being a group of stupid, reactionary herd animals. I'll address the last one first. Have you ever noticed the vitriol whistleblowers face, even when it's exposing a threat to the safety and welfare of the general public? Why do we as a group respond in such a manner? Logic would dictate that we would be grateful to the whistleblower, but we aren't. I think this is so because we wrongly perceive power to be safety, so when someone "rocks the boat" , so to speak, we see that as the threat, not the exposure of corruption, etc. on the part of those in power. As for misunderstanding, it is often fed by quotes. For example, a friend called me in a flap because her son showed her a quote from a feminist saying that all sex is rape. She tried to use this against me, citing that this is the shit people like me foist upon others. After a 20 second Google search, I found the author of the quote (name escapes me). The quote was taken out of context from a 20 MINUTE presentation (which took place in the early 90s) on challenging the concept that consent is concrete. She, a law professor at a well-respected university, stated that a person's background and experiences will alter what is and isn't acceptable to the individual (a person who experienced varying degrees of sexual assault during formative years is likely to accept more denigrating behaviours than someone raised in a supportive home that cultured personal autonomy). Then there's our attraction, as a culture, to looking to the most outlandish examples, no matter how rare, to support our viewpoints - primarily because we equate being wrong with being bad. We will avoid being wrong at all costs, and I think that's why there's the misconception of feminism – because many of these people point out some of the wrongs of our society. Then, as a deflection, we trip over ourselves to point out what is wrong with them because we fear for the safety of the unit, even though the unit itself is flawed and sick. Feminism today aint feminism period. if it was all these posers calling themselves feminists, would stick up and do something about all atrocities happening in Saudiarabia or any of the 3rd world countries less equipped and educated to deal with it.Also another thing, why are people so hellbent on jumping the equality wagon?By nature we are not equal, we are born and are genetically not equal and it ties into everyday life weather it being stuff related to household, work, hobbies, salaries political views stamina muscle intellect etc etc the list goes on. There is no possible way to achive gender equality and thinking so is plainly retarded. In terms of work related equality its also completely situation based and case to case sensitive. One cant just say "work" and say equality. Why? let me picture 2 scenarios-1: We have a workplace in a coalmine or an Oilrig wich is heavily maledominant because we have better stamina by a pure biologic fact.2 We got hospitals and nursing wokrareas wich are a caring and emotional workspace wich are heavily femaledominated.The reason it looks like this is because by nature women are generally better at work related to caring for other people by a biological design.It is like this because of the fact that the ability to give birth comes with the pure instinct to protect. And the same goes for Men in heavily male dominated workareas, we were the hunters and as such we had to endure long periods of stress and fear, wich triggers adrenaline wich also boosts your stamina and endurance wich makes men far better at work that are heavily physical in nature.So when people ask for equality its just not ever gonna happen on the scale feminists today crave. Feminism is a movement to end all sexism , sexist oppression, sexist exploitation and sexist violence. That includes sexism for men, women, children, non binary and persons regardless of gender , sexuality, class or race . "Today feminism is no longer a dirty word..." I'm sorry but there are so many people who think feminism is irrelevant and not needed today. These questions show a very distinct difference of how men are given merit based on their intellect and creativity, whereas women are mostly questioned about their image. It is much easier to capitalise on a "sexy" woman than an "intelligent" woman . If people don't see an issue with this then you are sexist. If you want to be with a woman but want her to be like "one of the boys and not care about the way people validate her in the world", you are sexist. Feminism is not about women being modest, it's about recognising the multiplicity of men and women. More so than men actually. It's illegal to circumcise a woman , it's legal to circumcise a man. So you're both wrong, and bodily rights are something women have over men. So woman have at least one legal right men do not.Trans rights and women's rights are not the same thing, it's also nothing to do with feminism, so meaningless to mention. You're right, that was nothing , except a dumb question that only an idiot wouldn't understand. So I say you can't do something, and you sit there and don't do it. You realize that you are proving women are equal right? Everytime you fail to even attempt to answer my question you prove to both me and anyone else who sees this that I'm right and you're wrong. Instead of proving your position wrong I'd think you'd want to prove me full of shit and your position correct. Doesn't it seem counter to your position to prove mine right and yours wrong? Race sexuality and religion aren't sexes, they are races sexuality and religions, so again nothing at all to do with feminism, you know the "equality between the sexes" thing. When you bring up things that have nothing to do with feminism, or with what I have said you look very foolish indeed. The people not honoring the law or written word would be called feminists. I wrote and I quote "what if" at no point did I say that a little girl FACTUALLY asked, so you writing "it was silly of you to assume that i'd make assumptions without looking things up first" made absolutely no sense because at no point did I state that a girl in fact asked. I never claimed it was factual, just most probable in my mind. Red carpet questions are often pulled from questions asked online or by fans, and it one of the reasons they say thing like, "the people want to know..." because the people are generally the ones posing this question.Yes a man did in fact ask the question, but I think we would both agree that he was not asking dieting tips from a 13 year old girl so he could implement them into his daily life. I believe he was asking on behalf of a girl her age or from a fan posed question. I think that is entirely reasonable. I have asked people my age who were in great shape when I was 14 because I wanted to look like them. Is is so wrong to ask someone your age for help on an issue like that? So yes, it does take away from the "weirdness".Also I cannot find the information you are citing, nor did you cite it. What's Up - "exceptions do not defeat norms." They were examples. I'd argue they're not exceptions, but that they are norms themselves. "typically, it's women that are asked questions about dieting and such." You're stating that like it's a known fact. All I'm arguing is that men are asked just as frequently (see the examples I provided in my previous comment). "asking someone who isn't training to be a superhero is silly." Your beliefs on why he asked the questions are irrelevant. As a professional, he should be mindful of how things can come across. Asking a girl who shouldn't be worrying about diets or body image should not be asked that lmao. It's pretty plain to see. It's not wrong to ask people about dieting, it IS weird to ask a young professional actress who shouldn't be worrying about that. Fact of the matter is that it's extremely weird at the least. It's as easy as googling her name followed by "dieting question." Only about a dozen articles will pop up with extensive information on the situation. I can only find information on the guy asking her the question, but not the origin of the question. This is why I have reason to doubt. I have seen obese 13 year olds of both genders, so a question about dieting at that age does not seem inappropriate to me.You keep saying that someone that age should not be worrying about their diet and that therefore it is inappropriate, so my question to you is at what age is it "appropriate" to start asking about dieting? I drastically changed my diet at 14 years old and that is only a year off. I got in shape after asking people my age who were in good shape and celebrities I looked up to. I personally didn't find Rowan's question sexist. But I was definitely annoyed they asked her that, only because shes 13 still so young and it's just not something you ask a 13 year old girl.	Old	Age - Over 65s	1/35	2.857
Quotenwagnerianer - They asked for "dieting tips" not your usage of "beauty diets". Once again I will restate, it is NOT unreasonable for someone who is fat or obese to ask "dieting tips" to a girl whom they look up to and see in much better shape then themselves. I got in shape after I asked these very questions to people my age at 14 years old , this girl was 13 so it is the same thing. This question is far from unreasonable, so I do not understand the outrage I see in the comment section over this. Ok so first of all, it's not sexist to ask a woman a question that you wouldn't ask a man. Men and women are different, you wouldn't ask a man if his period is making him feel sick and yet you would a woman . There is nothing sexist about that. You probably don't even know what sexism is. It's the belief or suggestion that one gender is superior to the other. It is not treating people differently based on their sex . So no the question is not sexist to ask her about her diet, and I don't even think it's fucked up as you put it. Diet is part of lifestyle a healthy diet = a healthy lifestyle. You are adding all sorts of assumptions here that aren't actually true. You're assuming it's an adult posing the question to pressure her about her weight, when in reality it is most likely a young girl asking the question to get advice from someone they admire. You assume diet is a bad thing, which is weird . What is bad about being healthy exactly? Sure some diets are horrible, but for the most part a specific diet is a good thing. There's a laundry list of health issues that stem from poor diet. None of these are sexist except the last one. The only sexism is the list itself and these comments. Claiming that men are not allowed to have sexuality, are not allowed to be interested in women and their looks. That is sexist. Also nobody is shoving anything on anybody, not like obese men and women are being dragged into the streets at night and force fed their vegetables. Sara Adams i always get a little tilted when child stars are overly political simply because at that age , you're arguably too young to have your own opinions on things. You may think you do, but you wouldn't recognize that you have been reared to think and believe in certain things.However, its stupid to be talking about dieting at like 13. for both boys and girls. best time to is like 16 minimum to start lifting for something but that's about it. No, I think sexism is terrible and I believe in equality between the genders. What I get out of this topic is proving why health questions are extremely important for young adults and teenagers as they often begin to shape the rest of their lives. I do not want people to watch this then be afraid to ask a fellow classmate or peer what they are doing to be in shape out of fear of being labeled a "sexist misogynist ". Joshua Fyfe Le tme answe your question being a gilr. Hello, i am a girl. We often get girl magazines right? where expectations of our body image are placed over expectations on emotional/health/intelligence. So this girl, which show teaches to be who you are and love yourself gets asked a question about dieting as if she was a professional in nutrition? That is why we have so may problems with girls and diets, cause is seems normal for a girl that age to be in a slim-diet when it shouldnt. That is why we got the kardashians everywhere trying to sell magic lolypops and teas and girls going towards bulimia and anorexia. No other 13 year old disney actor has been asked this question, but it seems ok to ask a girl cause as a previous comment stated, girls are expected to be always "product ready" in a society where women are seen as products rather than as humans it is easy to deny these sexism , but it exists. If you, as a 14 year old dude go to a 14 year old dude in a conversation as friends or people that know each other at leat, is completely different to being an adult and asking a 13 year old for her diet when you could have a million other more interesting questions on an event like that. What this question did was just bringing an empowered human back into a "product ready girl". That is why we had Millie Bobby Brown (also 13) called the "one of the sexiest tv stars" cause we are normalizing girls-diet-image slim-girls. So yeah, it is sexist cause no other 13 year old disney actor has been asked the same question, it limits her potential only towards her body	Age, Old, Sexism	Age - General, Age - Over 65s, Gender - General	7/295	2.373

Both scenes should not occure.. It degrades men and women, for no damn good reason!When a man interviewer can only think that a woman is interesting only for her body in acting, it's really repulsif. The Ariana Grande question is pretty legit. Teenage boys are often asked questions like " what would you prefer, video games or girls ". Way to stereotype young boys!!! For the typical young girl, the Arianna Grande fanbase, cellphones and makeup is something really important. Its something girls rarely leave behind, and are very emotionally attached too. In my class the first thing a girl does when she sits is check her makeup and check her phone, same thing when she goes to the restroom, cafeteria, playground, sits in a car...As for the Scarlett Johansson and Anna Hatheway, the questions were very rude. +davehshssometimes people ask me if i wear a jockstrap while i play paintball and i’m like:”if i were a girl you wouldn’t ask me that”, sometimes sexism is very unbearable. Seriously though, if you want to consider a question about hair sexist then having ms mojo as a separate channel is sexist, if you think about it they divide their videos based on what they think women like. Men and women are different, they like different things and they get asked different questions, that is not sexism . However, how can you consider a question about hair sexist and ignore that some journalists(mostly women) make articles about some actor’s genitals? I have seen articles about bulges, i have seen an article talking about eminem’s erection problems. just look at these titles:”DANIEL CRAIG ADMITS HE HAD TO USE STUNT DOUBLES PACKING STUNT PENISES FOR HIS SEX SCENES IN NEW JAMES BOND MOVIE””Daniel Radcliffe: My willy shrank on stage””Shia LaBeouf Admits His Shortcomings”i guess it’s only sexist when men do it	Sex, Sexism	Gender - General	3/173	1.734
+Bukke Your analogies aren’t applicable. Asking a paintball player if he wears a jockstrap is a logical question, considering the obvious danger to his balls. And since Daniel Craig was doing full-frontal nudity, it’s logical that he might be defensive about the size of his willy. It is NOT logical to ask women questions about their underwear and body parts when neither was in view in the scenes being referenced. Nobody would have asked Craig about his willy if he had been fully dressed, as were the women who were asked about THEIR privates.	Nobody	Age - Youngsters	1/94	1.064

I want to stress anyway that i don't consider either sexist, even if a question is unrelated it's just that, an unrelated question. I Am not a celebrity, but i have had similiar questions in my Life. Is It sexist? If not, when does It become sexist, is It that After a certain Number of people know me It magically becomes sexist? Woman	Gender - General	1/69	1.449
Every single woman in Hollywood doesn't flaunt her sexuality. Top of the hat let's take the Hunger Games series. Secondly for a very long time, (and sadly in cinema even today) women were given minor roles where it was demanded of them to flaunt their sexuality for the gratification of a male audience which had next to no interest in an actress with a serious meaningful role which still happens today.And if you could see, even for an action movie Anna was asked about her figure which was in no way related to the movie's content, at all. Women, even when flaunting their bodies would loved to be asked about other topics because their appearance isn't the sum of their worth as people or artists. It wouldn't be very absurd to ask about their figure at let's say, a fashion show. But that's not the case, from action movies to radio interviews all women are asked is about their appearance and other overly feminised topics which is irrelevant. No one really goes, "What brand is your favourite cologne?" while a male superstar is promoting an action movie. This is my feminist argument for those who think that women are undesirable when they speak out for what they believe in.	Woman	Gender - General	1/210	0.476
The Pastel Candy Cat In Wonderland you remind of black people who feel blatant racism is fine because racist white people exist. You are much worse than most of the comments you read. Existential Crisis Porcupine you're argument isn't rational. She was a comic book character, the character has a certain physique and she had to train to match it. Men do the same thing and tolerate similar questions without complaint (Watch some Chris Pratt interviews when he got ripped for GOG). This double standard where asking a woman anything like that is a crime and asking men about their diet and exercise is fine is not ok. If you want equality (what feminism is supposed to be) than take a stance against anyone being asked about diet/fitness questions when it's perfectly relevant. This tunnel vision of seeing oppressed woman when men get treated the same way outlines the hypocrisy of third wave feminism perfectly. And as for actresses today still just being oogle material, well that's just too ridiculous to argue against. I could list dozens of strong female supporting and lead roles that aren't sexualized at all. Obviously some roles are sexualized but men deal with that too. If a movie has a ripped lead there's almost always a shirtless scene. I'm not against feminism in any way but when woman use it to get offended about things that equally effect men, it's no longer feminism according to feminism's very definition.	Woman	Gender - General	3/210	1.429
That is the fault of the industry and the consumers, not the actresses and female celebrities. Many of these women are just playing the game in order to make a living. If the industry and people who idolized these women respected them more for their talent rather than their looks, then they would not be obligated to dress a certain way for publicity. They simply could wear what they want, revealing or conservative, and their talent would determine their career trajectory. The fact thay we boot women from hollywood once they reach a certain age , which is sooner for women than men, is proof that we value the woman's appearance more than her talent. And these sexist questions from interviewers only continues to bring attention to a womans appearance rather than her ability.	Age	Age - General	1/133	0.752

Also Williams isnt the best Tennis player ever, in fact there are at least 201 Men better than her as the male Tennis Pro ranked at 201 won 6 0 6 1 6 0, so she is far off from being the best tennis player in general, but in fact the best woman . Lightweight Boxing champion also gets called " lightweight boxing champion" and not "boxing champion of the world" so, it makes perfect sense to say "best female player" instead of "best player in the world" as this wouldnt be true, as there are better players in the world, who are male. The thing with the popstar girl in the radio station is also a normal question, as you can see, she always wears make up and also sends many tweets, so she is, perfectly evident, in use of these two things quite often, so how is it sexist to ask this question? Beth Leigh Chris Pratt was asked about his diet and exercise routine leading up to the release of The Guardians of the Galaxy. I'm sure Channing Tatum was asked a dozen times during interviews about his exercises and diet before Magic Mike came out. I will concede that women probably get these questions more often but The Rock is not a rare example, it's just when men are asked it's not treated as bad, it's more commonplace. Kinda like Joker from Dark Knight..."If I ask a dozen male actors about their diet and exercise routine, nobody panics. But I ask one actress that and everyone losses their mind." I've seen female reporters ask pretty uncomfortable questions about male actors before. And I'm sure Chris Hemsworth , channing Tatum, Chris Pratt, and any man who clearly worked out for a role is asked the same.I mainly didn't like the one about "How do you balance your career and personal life?" Not because it was sexist. The response was dumb. Yeah they probably would ask a man that. It's a pretty reasonable question for a celebrity.	Dumb	Physical Identity - Physical (and Mental) Impairments	1/77	1.299
You really need to rethink your attitude towards gender specific questions like these, if you can't spot the sexism in most of them.	Gender, Sexism	Gender - General	2/23	8.696
I'm probably not the best person to try to explain why they are sexist, but let's give it a go.Firstly, it's sexist not only to women, but to men in celebrity culture too, that they are asked specific questions the other gender may not be asked. It's arguably worse for women, who tend to get asked questions like 'how do you balance your work and personal life' - like women can't handle having a relationship and children whilst working. That question also assumes that the mother is the primary carer of the child, whereas the partner is more often than not responsible for half the care.Secondly, questions about underwear:hair colour diet advice are irrelevant to the job these ladies (and men!! Who get asked about work out routines too) are doing. These people are WORKING, the interview is a job, part of the promotional process for their product. They're being professional, and the interviewer is askin about personal things, which is inappropriate. Also asking about diet tips further adds to a culture where in women should all be worried about how they look, and unfortunately adds to a culture where in men feel as though they need to bulk up. This not only helps in causing eating disorders, but imagine constantly being probed about your weight - these celebrities must feel like shit all the time. (And no, just because they're famous doesn't mean it 'comes with the job', and No, just because they're rich doesn't mean they should just forget about it)There is LOADS more I can say on this topic, and I don't want to sound preachy but I do hope you read through and some of what I said makes sense to you, even if you don't agree with it all.	Gender	Gender - General	1/297	0.337

I mean I knew before I clicked on this video that it was going to be bullshit, but man was I surprised anyway to see what constitutes as "sexism" these days. What really got me was the Ariana Grande question. There's nothing sexist about asking that question of a girl whose phone is probably permanently glued to her hand and who's wearing an entire Sephora worth of products on her face. There's nothing sexist about asking a woman about whose dress she's wearing on a red carpet. Rihanna being asked what she's looking for in a man is sexist apparently, but if a guy was asked that question, nobody would bat an eyelid. And maybe Emma Stone gets asked stupid questions because she looks like she doesn't have two brain cells to rub together. And maybe an interviewer asked Johansson what she's wearing under her catsuit. So what. It's tight as fuck. And she' hot - if she's mad at guys noticing, maybe she should wear a burka. And the Serena Williams one? God, I hope you're joking. She's a woman, if you haven't noticed. SO SHE GOT ASKED WHAT IT WAS LIKE TO BE THE WORLD'S BEST FEMALE ATHLETE. I THINK IT WOULD BE WAY MORE DISTURBING IF THEY ASKED HER WHAT IT WAS LIKE TO BE THE WORLD'S BEST MALE ATHLETE. Don't you? I can't even. Honestly, if these are the worst examples of sexism you could dig up, than I don't know what the problem is. some of these questions are stupid , like the mad max one and the last one . but the rest are just goofy questions which have male equivalent ones as well . whats wrong with asking about someones hair color , or her fitness program , would a man complain if he was asked the same question ? i don't think so , to me it seems these women are just showing their insecurities .What i understand is this , men and women are different , and more often than not , they fit their gender stereotype(individuals might differ but this is the safer bet) , i know many women who like their hairstyles to be noticed , and they love to be asked about them (or at least they appear to) and many me who love to talk about their fitness programs . its not sexism to have different questions for different genders , it's sexism when you judge someone based on their gender , like not hiring a qualified women for a job , or like the madmax one which suggested the movie would be better without the women just because they were women (regardless of the story). Number 10. That’s not sexist. It was not sexist in any way. They wanted to know what it feels like to be one of the greatest female athletes ever. Why is that sexist?Number 9 could be sexist, depending on how the speaker intentioned his question. There is nothing inherently misogynistic in it but could have been meant in a misogynistic way, like he could have been asking to see if the actor was cool with it etc. Number 8 also depends on the intention of the questioner. It could be that the asker simply wanted to know if she took after the kids, or her husband or a maid etc, just for the reason that majority of the time, it is women and not men who stay home with the kids. Number 7 I don’t get what’s wrong with asking a question about hair. And I don’t think to say the only reason is because he was a boy. I do see how this could be seen as sexist though. Number 6 again depends if it was a joke or real, but could be seen as sexist. Number 5, when wearing tight clothes, you can sometimes see anything under the costume, so it is an actual question to wear her suit wasn’t allowed to have those shapes and she couldn’t wear anything under. Also, Stark is a main character who changed dramatically from how first movie to where he would sacrifice himself. Black widow does have some character development but not close to as much. I can see how you might see this as sexist. Number 4 again sexist? Why? It was possible that she digested for the role. It wasn’t a good question but I doubt it’s sexist.Number 3 again, why is this sexist? She had a good answer, but the question wasn’t sexist. And she was very fit, so he wasn’t to know how. I don’t get how asking diet questions is sexist...Number 2. It was a question about 2 things she probably used often. They didn’t say it was a question all girls go through, or that it was bad etc. they asked about what she would rather use. And talking about things girls often do is sexist? Men and women do different things. Obvuolsy they can do the same, but much more women use makeup for example. Number 1 is sexist. No denying that. Also asking what she wants in a man isn’t sexist. I believe that women have it much much easier than men in western culture. While men have it much harder, and are therefore much more likely to live a very difficult and depressing life. But the area where women do have it worse is sex related harassment. Plus they have to deal with the fear of rape out in the civilian world. Which must be terrifying. That alone is some heavy shit to deal with. That and sexual harassment. When it comes to sexual harassment. None of it's ok. Although some of the damage caused from a certain "event" is blown way out of proportion by some women sometimes. Ugh. That sounded bad. But keep reading. Like when a girl says she has had a mental breakdown and has trouble sleeping, from the time her butt was pinched. The guy who did that needs his ass kicked at the very least, But if a girl becomes that much of a wreck over her butt being touched (believe it or not, old ladies have done this to alot of us men too) then I dont think its uncalled for to assume that she might have a mental issue or two that needs to be treated. As I dont think thats a normal response. Annoyance, yes. Anger, yes. Both of those are healthy and understandable responses. But trouble sleeping and and mental instability is not so understandable imo over that particular occurrence. So SOME stuff in this video sometimes falls in that area for me. In the way that women have characterized THEMSELVES. Then they get mad when consequences of that come up. Like one of the very first clips in this video. The camera man looks at her shoes then goes up, and she seriously asks "is this something you do to the men too?". Well, the fact that fashion is a big deal at these events. Im sure there is a man they did the same thing too if he dresses outside the norm of the other men at these shows. But even if it is only done for the women. Which is probably mostly true. What is strange or sexist about that? Dresses and womens shoes are drastically different from eachother, and other women like to even see that. Of course it makes sense for the camera man to get a look out of the womens outfits as apposed to men. Most of the men are dressed similar, and it's not really a scene men get into anyway. women themselves have culturally been much more into fashion and their looks then men have. This is just a fact. You could say there are men who care about their looks and fashion as much as women. That's true. But they are the minority when it comes to the male population. While women who are interested in looks and fashion are in the majority amongst the female population. So freaking out about that sort of thing and calling it sexist is not just blowing it out of proportion. But it's also dishonest. Same kind of thing goes for ScarJo's reaction to being asked about underwear. While I sympathize with her reaction, and definitely do see the sexism there. It's still worth pointing out that Black Widows character is one that relies on using sexuality as a weapon. That fact is shown in the name of the character too. So yes, When someone sees that costume. It's going to be through a lens of sex. So it does sort of make sense as to why a question involving underwear would be asked toward a women playing a character like that. Plus she's wearing a cat suit. So I think the question was more about the curiosity over panty lines. Which again. does not apply to any of the other	Black, Mental, Old, Sex, Sexism, Sexual	Age - Over 65s, Ethnicity - Black, Gender - General, Physical Identity - Physical (and Mental) Impairments	11/651	1.69

Nothing sexist about the question to Ariana Grande whatsoever. I've got my mum, 2 sisters, a niece, and 10 female cousins. Apart from my oldest sister, the other 13 female members of my family love their dresses, shoes, make-up, handbags, perfumes etc. Then there's game shows where when asked what they'd spend the money on if they won, men usually reply with things like a holiday, a car, or something for their house, while the women most of the time say holiday, I've seen shit loads of women recently say they'd get a make-over, new dresses for their wardrobe, a spa/pampering weekend, and new shoes or handbags (even when they've admitted to owning 100's already). It's a fact that most women care more about how they look and feel than anything else, which is why they'd rather spend any extra money they have on making themselves look and feel good, unless they have kids of course. It's also a fact that most women spend more time on websites like Facebook or Twitter making status updates, posting selfies or checking in to places, than men do. (I'm an exception to that rule as I'm online almost 24/7 when I'm not watching my films or TV shows). Ariana Grande in every single video she's full of make up, and always trying to look sexy, like a typical woman. I can't say I know what her social media habits are like as I don't follow her Facebook/Twitter/Instagram etc, but by the looks of it she does a few posts a week on each. Now asking her to choose between her make-up or her phone, would be like asking me to choose between watching my football team or watching my favourite TV shows. It'd be almost impossible to answer, but it wouldn't be sexist.	Nothing, Woman	Age - Youngsters, Gender - General	2/300	0.667
supreme ky also people keep saying that a question is sexist cuz it only gets asked to a certain gender which isn't really what makes a question sexist. supreme ky 1 - RDJ wasn't asked because he didn't need to lose or gain any weight for the role unlike Chris Evans, Chris Hemsworth, Jeremy Renner, Tom Holland, Chadwick Boseman, and Scarlett Johansson etc. RDJ's suit does the work for him so he's just a normal guy like Mark Ruffalo who also doesn't need to lose/gain any weight for his role as the Hulk is all CGI.2 - Justin Bieber gets asked about his weight and diet all the time. He wasn't asked when he was a teenager, because like me and every other guy on the planet, we couldn't give a fuck about diet. I went to an all boys school with 1000+ pupils. Practically every single one of those pupils played Football in the mornings, on their morning break, on their lunch break, and after school too. Hardly any of us sat down in a canteen to eat, as most of us ate while we walked. Sandwiches, sausage rolls, pizza slices, fries, burgers, hotdogs etc, or sweets were the type of things we ate on our way to play Football, therefore most people were still hungry after school so everyone who had money got scallop butties, fish and chips, sausage butties, 'school specials' etc from the fish and chip shop across the road, or went to the bakery to buy things like iced buns every single day. We're not like girls, we don't obsess over our appearance. We got fit by having fun playing Football constantly, yet the girls at our all girl sister school down the road, never bothered exercising from the look of things. Whenever us older 16-18yo's in 6th form went down to the all girls school for lessons, to meet someone, or on our way to way to town, the girls would mainly all be sitting down doing nothing on their breaks. There was hardly anyone playing hopscotch, skipping, netball or whatever else girls play, so no wonder they obsess over their weight as they rarely do exercise as teenagers. It was exactly the same in my nearby neighbourhoods at home. There was at least 20 of us in the neighbourhood to my left, and while all the guys were playing Rugby, Football or riding our bikes, the girls would be sitting down watching us. It was similar in the neighbourhood to my right, while the guys were running around playing Football or riding our bikes, the girls would be sitting down doing nothing. The only games the girls ever played was 'Kerby' where you throw a ball at the kerb to make it bounce back to you, standing still the majority of the time.3 - It's blatantly obvious you're a kid bringing up shit modern rappers. Obviously they won't be asked the same questions, because as I said on the post above yours most females are obsessed with looks and material things. There is nothing wrong with sexist qns tbh before u fold your arms and get defensive hold your horses let me explain .Women and man were made different we face different issues and we have different good points as well. Different Questions will be given to ppl of different sex .For ariana grande case .Ahe was ask if she will prefer to do her makeup one last time or use her phone .It is indeed true women more commonly use makeup as compared to men and there is nothing to be shameful of it as it portrays creativity. Man may get qns like would u cut your hair or lose your phone wherelese women may receive less of this sort of qns .why? it's because men place a large emphasis on our hair and it is our form of creativity not saying women can't do their hair but the main point is yes men place a great emphasis on hair so qns like that are bound to be ask .and ONE QN THAT ACTRESSES do not like and that is on dieting .Firstly why do women get dieting questions more than man it is simply because women become obese more easily than man (this is not just random bs [LINK] read up the article) because they become obese more easily it is normal for them to go on a diet more frequently .U see man and women have our good and bad points .in case ppl say I am not equal let me give u a advantage of women in comparison to man .women are naturally more smarter than man if u go check it up there is a higher number of graduates that are women than man so women are autually better than man in terms of academics . Flingship373 Men are the superior athletes compared to women, and that's a fact you can't deny.Men are physically stronger and faster than women.Professional female football teams get beat by school kids and amateur men's teams on a regular basis.And as for tennis, females have lighter balls to make it look as though they hit as hard as the men. There have been countless men vs women tennis matches over the years, and a woman has only won once. Usually the men are outside the Top 200 in the rankings, yet they still beat the top female tennis players.Karsten Braasch ranked 203rd in the world, played both the Williams sisters one after another, on a day where he had played golf earlier in the day, had done no training, had a couple of shandies, and didn't play to his full potential, yet he still smashed them.The only time a woman has won (without something like a points advantage) was Billie Jean King against a 55yo Bobby Riggs. This whole list apart from the underwear question and the Helen Mirren clip, is just a bunch of too bit snobs complaining about nothing. There is a reason women get asked about beauty and fitness. The answer is that those things are inherent parts of femininity. This is not to say that there is no sexism in a lot of Hollywood but these were just not examples of it at all. I mean really, going on a radio show that is know for it's degeneracy and then cry sexism when you get asked a question about sex is like going into a candy store and being outraged that they have licorice; You would prefer they not have it but you knew it was a high possibility. The fitness questions posed to Scarlett and Anne were exactly the question that should be asked along with other things but just think about it logically without the SEXISM glasses. Both of these women stepped into roles that are extremely physically demanding, I mean with the amount of flips and spin kicks they both do my god. So is it then not interesting to hear about the most likely, intensive fitness regiment that they had to endure to play these iconic roles? Just as the same type of question was posed to Sylvester, Chris Evens, and Gal Gadot and many other actors both male and female through out movie history when they play physically taxing roles or even mentally. The diet bit posed to the kid was a bit weird but hardly sexist and then her little rant about womens images was just BS and also sexist; 1 for blaming man for women choosing to buy loads of cosmetics and 2 for removing the agency of women to act in their own self interests. Lastly the most comical of all. The Ariana piece was just plain laughable. So she pedals garbage and calls it music but then to supplement the garbage she over sexualizes every single song she puts out by dressing like a pornstar with the makeup all caked on literally selling her sexuality in all of them and then as the nerve to complain about sexism. I'm sorry but no. To answer the question; Yes that is exactly two things that girls would struggle to choose between for the most part Just as a choice between PC or Console would be to boys for the most part. Also there is nothing inherently sexist about asking girl type questions to girls and the same for boys just as you would ask Rap type questions to Jay Z. This Damn list is a shame. ha Sexism.. Second; If you believe that asking an actress(or actor) about their physical appearance is somehow a dumb down question, then the only sexist here is you. Their whole job revolves around there bloody physical appearance and what little actual acting or vocal talent they got (good acting die a while back, in case you didn't realize.) i agree that the term 'feminism' does have some connotation, and is a bit toxic. i think most people forget that the real definition of it means equality for not only both genders, but for everyone, i.e race , religion, age ... etc. when someone calls themselves a feminist, people look at them much differently. hell, this guy asked if i was a feminist because i got angry at him for saying to a girls face, 'i'm gonna fucking rape you.' the reason feminism exists is because there is too much oppression in the world. when straight, white, cis men say they are oppressed, some feminists can cut them off, because they know that's extremely untrue. there are femi-nazis, who claim women are the superior race , and that all men are worthless and inferior. that's where all this toxicity comes into play, because they then label themselves as feminists, which is absolutely incorrect. i think the only reason this is such a sensitive issue is because so many people are uneducated about the topic, resulting in men-hating women and women-hating men. Candice Nicole - For starters you should know I recognize the good feminists. My own sister was a feminist for years and she did not have toxic ideas. If you look at the most popular feminist movements, in general, feminists have very toxic ideas. For example I listed several below. Wage Gap - (Fallacy)According to the US Department of Labor (feel free to look this up) men work on average at least 4 more hours than women do every week. 52 weeks in a year makes at least 208 more hours on average. If men are working over 200 hours than woman a year, then of course the medians will be higher. The idea that men are paid more for the same job is a false extrapolation from a statistical median in a distribution of data points. Free The Nipple Movement - (Vulgarity and Hypocrisy)I cannot think of a more useless movement if I can be honest. I can be drafted and die at war because I have a Y chromosome and women do not have to because they have two X's, yet they want to complain about sexism? Both women and men have struggles, but I do not see the majority of feminists also fighting SERIOUS mens' issues like alarmingly high suicide rates, but yeah let's free the nipple? Hypocrisy. Patriarchy - (Imaginary)Women have higher IQ's and grades then men on average. Women have better access to college grants/scholarships, healthcare, and government aid simply because they are a woman. I do not see evidence of this mythical group trying to hold women back. If anything men have historically been told to sacrifice their time, finances, and even lives for women with nothing in return. I see more evidence of a "Matriarchy" haha. Rape Culture - (Toxicity)Feminists will say that we live in a rape culture because some men have raped and got away with it. By that same logic we must also live in a murder culture, thief culture, and littering culture. Do these cultures exist? Are there some men out there who want to rape? Yes of course, but to call a whole country a rape culture based on these rare accounts is simply inaccurate. This country is not "pro rape", I have never met someone in my life who thought rape was a good idea. Our laws are against rape and rapists, especially child rapists, go to prison for a long time as they should. Yes the court system makes mistakes, but those minorities do not stand for the 300+ million people who live in the U.S. We do not live in a rape culture for the same reason who do not live in a murder culture, and telling young men that they are all potential rapists is deplorable and shows the toxicity and bias of feminism against men. These are just 4 myths and toxic ideas that are associated with feminism. Based on these ideas, you can define modern feminist ideas to be, in general, toxic. Thank you for reading.	Nothing, Patriarchy, Sexism, Woman	Age - Youngsters, Gender - General	5/508	0.984

Joshua Fyfe Well, it's good you're a believer in the statistics. However, what you've (sort of) cited doesn't dismiss the wage gap problem, it kinda reinforces it. Average work hours actually only differs by 0.4 hours per day which amounts to only 2 hours per week. That means women work on average 95 than that of men, but still only earn 79 the wage... Obviously that's still leaves a 16 gap (depending, of course, on your ethnicity.) However, this hourly average only refers to only paid additional hours... so it's not exactly the most reliable as this could go either way: either women don't work longer hours, or they do but just don't get paid the extra hours. Studies have shown that women actually work on average 50 minutes more per day than men in unpaid workplace labour. So, if men work 24 minutes more per day in paid labour, then women are still working an additional 26 minutes more than men per day - meaning women work 4 more than men. Also, higher paying jobs tend to have longer hours - so, if women arn't being hired to higher paying jobs, then of course they arn't racking up the additional 24 minutes of paid labor each day - and, given that women in the West tend to hold more degrees than men, it begs the question why men continue to get the higher paying jobs? You'll never convince me discrimination against women in the workplace (which leads to the pay gap) doesn't exists - because not only is it statistically supported, I've seen it over and over and over again. A supervisory position came up in an office, containing 38 women and 1 man (minus the existing manager). 14 women candidates with post-secondary education, 5 to 30 years of experience, and most regularly worked after hours (unpaid) applied. The 1 man (my friend), who had only been employed for 8 months, didn't have a post-secondary education, and didn't stay a minute after finish time (not that he has to, it's his right) was the one who was hired. In another office, my colleague reported to our boss that she was pregnant, and his response was to tell her that she had "thrown her career out the window." During her maternity leave, they surplused her job, renamed it, denied her application and gave the "new" job to a man. She had a month to find a new job within the company and as a result took a $2000/week pay cut. I don't even know how to respond to your offense to "Free the Nipple", other then to roll my eyes. 'Vulgar', really? I mean... you're just reaching for anything at this point.... Like, who cares of some women want to go topless just like men are allowed to go topless? This is your definition of toxic?Patriarchy isn't a mythical illuminati group, it's a social system which has been built upon since the dawn of time. I mean, I think we can all recognize that things were pretty shitty for women rights on paper up to the last century... Women couldn't vote until the 20s, you could legally be fired for getting pregnant before the 60s, couldn't get a credit card without a male co-signer until the 70s, it wasn't until the 90s that you were allowed to refuse sex with your husband... that's not that long ago. I'll back up.... 'patriarchy' is a social system established by men in predominate in roles of political and moral leadership. On a basic level, we can look at the U.S. Congress.... The record high is 20 women.... In a country where 50 of the population is women. Even with that "record"	Ethnicity, Patriarchy, Sex, Sexual, Woman	Ethnicity - General, Gender - General	7/918	0.763

Candice Nicole Actually let me correct myself, it does exist, but there's nothing sexist about it. ---	---------	---------------------	------	-------

Candice Nicole oh my lord, that was one of the most painful things I have ever had the displeasure of reading. You seriously couldn't be more delusional of you tried. Every single one of your "talking points" have been debunked a million times by much smarter people than either of us. Your wage gap rant was particularly torturous. Anecdotal evidence proves nothing. And your "statistics" are extremely inaccurate. But forget statistics, seeing as no economist in the world will tell you the wage gap exists. It is an incredibly simple concept. Take whatever number you see fit for the argument, but I'll use the 77 one seeing as that is the most common. All men combined, earn a grand total of X amount. And all women combined, make 77 of X. That is how the number is derived. There are practically an infinite amount of factors to why that is. But it isn't ONLY because of sexism, or even a big part of it. That is complete and utter nonsense. The fact is, that it is completely illegal to pay 2 people different wages for the same job, regardless of gender, race, or what have you. Women don't get paid less for doing the same job. It's incredibly simple. Women and men just make different choices. Just like white people and black people make different choices, or Asian people and Latino people make different choices, etc etc... The wage gap is a complete and utter myth."Free the nipple". While that isn't necessarily "toxic"... The hypocrisy meter just exploded. Women don't want to be sexualized, and yell sexual harassment when a man fawns over a woman's cleavage... But they want to walk around with their tits out and demand that be normal? Lol the level of delusion people like you spew has ceased to amaze me. You do realize the video in which you are commenting on, do you? Where all these "sexist" questions were only ones directed at women, none at men. And most of these women got offended by questions about their physical appearance... But they want to free the nipple? Lmao hilariously delusional and hypocritical."Patriarchy isn't a mythical illuminati group." No, but it is a completely useless, meaningless, and made up word. I'm not at all claiming discrimination doesn't exist, it absolutely does. Women had it worse off than men, just like black people had it worse off than white people for a long time. But we don't live in those days anymore. Everyone has their rights. "So of course the male perspective has dominated and shaped society, it's only logical." No, it's only "logical" to someone as delusional as you. Sure, that could be true to some extent. But that doesn't at all mean that "women are oppressed today". Utter nonsense. By claiming things like "patriarchy", "rape culture" and "white privilege", you're actually setting the conversation backwards. You aren't pointing to ACTUAL cases of sexism or racism... Rather you're just implying that men are sexist just for being men, or that white people are racist just for being white. Oh right, but they're not doing it "consciously", right? "It's not men consciously trying to oppress women, it's a tradition that we have been raised with, which is why it's harder for some people to recognize it." Ohhhhhhh... it's "subconscious bias", I got ya. So it's not just that men are inherently sexist, but they're inherently sexist, without even knowing it. Wow. Ummm, did you say something about a boogeyman? Because you just created one. Candice Nicole "how do you explain the gap then?". How do you explain the gap between Asian people and black people? Or between Mexicans and Australians? If you compare different groups of people based on whatever factor you'd like, you are always going to come up with different numbers. They will never be the same. Women and men make different choices. Women tend to go into less risky jobs than men. They tend to work less hours. More women are stay at home parents than men. More men work overtime and take less vacation. And before you get on me for being sexist, I never said "all" women this, or "all" women that. But speaking generally, those are statistically true. Again, there are a million factors why the numbers aren't the same. And they are all more valid factors than " sexism ".	Black, Sexism	Ethnicity - Black, Gender - General	2/141	1.418
Just one thing. Feminism is described differently to many people and there are "strong" feminists and "light" feminists. People who are actually standing up against men who haven't done anything wrong and are trying to overthrow their rights or whatever are NOT feminists, they are sexists towards men. Sexism is a bad thing, and I'm not really a feminist but people have the right to express their feelings and women have the right to be treated as equals. People who are fighting for that right aren't "wrong" or "vulgar". When gender equality is a thing men won't have to work "0.4 more hours a day" than the avgerage woman , men won't be obliged to go to the army for their gender . If working 0.4 more hours a day and 200 hours a year more than women angers you, you can always join in the gender eqaulity fight so you won't have to work more than women, and women can get the same amount of wage men do. Also, it's okay to be against feminism, but don't blame the fact that many governments make men fight in wars because they think they're "geneitcally stronger" than women on feminists. It's not the feminists's fault the government treats men unfairly. If you have a problem with that, no one's stopping you from fighting for men's rights, too. Only it's not an 'unspoken assumption' targeted to the detriment of women. The true assumption here - which Murray couldn't wait to pounce on in a display of gesture 'politics' - is that the interviewer is deliberately negating the success of female tennis stars. I don't believe he was doing that. When the subject of the interview is the men's game that Murray - a man - has just won it's obvious what the interviewer is referring to. If a female sports star was being interviewed by a woman and reference was made to her 'unique' success I doubt if the female sports star would have interjected in defence of a man achieving a similar thing. But the question about Mirren's breasts was extremely relevant in her era. In that era women were naturally more thin , and with smaller breasts, so seeing a woman who had more packing up top was very rare. It's only obvious for someone to question if her bigger breasts were distractions, seeing as how every other female actress in that era was more or less flat chested. They didn't understand the appeal of bigger breasts, and couldn't fathom how they played into acting roles, because smaller breasts were the "normal" in those days.In fact, bigger breasts are only seen as normal today because they're mostly fake or chemically enhanced. Our food today has fattening chemicals injected into it, which actually heighten a woman 's curves, but with the downside that it could also make her gain more weight than she wanted. Beer is also popular for both sexes now, when in the past wine and champagnes were seen as female-only drinks, and beer for men. Beer is brewed with many chemicals that help enlarge breasts. It is uncommon for women to have natural big breasts even today.	Thin, Woman	Gender - General, Physical Identity - Physical Features	2/186	1.075

Except with a lot of these questions asked to female celebs, you do see similar questions being asked of male celebs. How many times has Chris Pratt been asked about his workout routine to get in shape for Guardians of the Galaxy? Some of the questions asked of male sex symbols, by female interviewers, are quite sexual in nature. The difference is how we view them. When a man asks a female celebrity a sexual question, we now see it as sexist and creepy. When a woman asks a male celebrity a sexual question, we view her as edgy and embracing her sexuality. When a female celebrity has her nudes taken and spread around on the internet, it's terrible and she's a victim. But those same people who complain about that, are often quick to take a peek a circulating photo of Justin Bieber's junk. I guess I'm just not a fan of how we inconsistently view these things. We see it as sexist when an interviewer asks a female celebrity if she'd rather give up makeup or her cell phone, two stereotypical female interests, but we wouldn't bat an eye at an interviewer who asked a young male celebrity if he'd rather give up beer or video games.	Sex, Sexual, Woman	Gender - General	5/209	2.392
Not to fuel any fires, but maybe it has something to do with the fact that all these celebs are creating oftentimes hyper sexualized portraits of women. Cat Woman, Black widow. If you take out the sexist before the creepy then you have an argument but just because you would ask a question to a woman and not to a man isn't sexist. Try to look at things from a different perspective because rn you believe that your interpretation of what was said is what the interviewer meant without trying to look at it from another view. I call it a "boob" hammock the same way that speedos are often referred to as " banana hammocks". So yes - technically it's a one piece. Can I tell the difference between women? No, Izzie. I prefer to just lump them all into one monolithic group and treat them all exactly the same. Because individuality doesn't matter (...this is sarcasm in case you didn't catch it. Though ironically I find that men actually often DO get lumped into a single group and assigned collective accusations of misogyny , fragility, aggression, and harassment on a regular basis. Because reasons.). So if you're just trying to catch me in fallacies regarding what I viewed versus what I wrote instead of actually getting to the issue, I'm not interested. Ok dude, don't you try and explain to me about "understanding the problem", because you clearly have no fucking clue, your patronising tone only makes you seem like more of a douche than you already are! You're using your narrow-minded view of the world to try and turn feminism around to make women seem like the problem, did you actually watch this video in it's entirety, or are you just trying to nitpick everything out of it that perhaps seems minutely contradictory to you? Ariana Grande may well be using her body to enhance her career, however that doesn't mean that she isn't working hard on creating her music and videos, and clearly you're drawn to the superficial, rather than drawing on the merits of her actual work! Besides, the interview clip on this particular video mentions nothing about her being sexualised, it was YOU who made that insinuation, the interviewer in question was focussing on superficial items that women and girls supposedly can't live without, rather than talking about her work, which was obviously the main reason for her being on that particular show. Why would one spend money in trying to get these guests, and then spend half the time asking sexist questions?! Seriously, stop trying to over-inflate your already rather sizeable ego by trying to suggest that men have it just as bad, because you have COMPLETELY missed the point of this video, and I implore you to go and educate yourself about the history of women's rights, there's some pretty fucked up shit that women and girls have had to go through to get to where they are now! We still live in a patriarchal society, and whilst the balance is being addressed, there's still a long way to go, and people like you who deny that feminism is necessary are not in any way helping address that balance! Kinda happy I found this comment. This section was starting to make me even more depressed about how our uber-privileged society likes to press upon all of us that women are oppressed and that men are overlords when, in this day and age , it's quite the opposite. I really hate it when videos like this pop up and try to make it look like women are preyed upon or are disrespected because of our gender or whatever. Only, like, two of those questions actually felt weird . The one with Mad Max and the one with Anne Hathaway's catsuit. All the others felt like they could've been handled better by both parties. All in all, I'm very annoyed with this society of Feminism and the pursuit of putting women above and beyond men. Very sad. Sorry, that was my rant. Had to get it out somewhere. Ian Christiansen My comment makes absolute sense. I'm sorry you're to shallow to understand but perhaps reiterating will help it sink in. Just because something is the norm aka sexualizing people's bodies does not make it right. Ariana choosing to wear something or not does not open the floor for commentary from people because it is the norm. If you cannot see that, that is what makes you part of the problem. I am perfectly capable of looking at both sides of the argument which is why your comment nearly made me lose IQ points. If you can actually see both points of view then i really don't understand how you can be so blind to the truth. Next, I did not say all men and their entitlement, I said "men and their entitlement", aka just because you watch a channel does not mean you get to decide whether or not they creat a mr mojo or not. If their decision not to create such a channel bothers you so much perhaps create your own platform to combat that. You don't have to watch them.	Blind	Physical Identity - Physical (and Mental) Impairments	1/185	0.541
Ian Christiansen By the way, my characterization of men like you are men who clearly see sexism but choose to rationalize it away on the basis of "it's the norm" or even worse "she knows what she is doing" as if women should be responsible for the over-sexualization of their bodies simply for existing and choosing to wear what they want. Ariana should have to face over-sexualization and demeaning commentary and/or questioning because men (and I say men because even when she tried to explain that there is more to her than makeup and her cellphone, the men in the video and you chose to base her entire personality off of a public persona that says nothing about her true personality) because she "knows what she is doing". You're responsible for your own IQ - not me. Also - don't put words in my mouth. I at no time said sexualizing women is or should be any kind of status quo. I'm speaking strictly about choosing to sexualize oneself as part of a "brand", but then expecting everyone to only be interested in your myriad intellectual complexities. Pop culture has rarely worked that way - and probably never really will. If you're gonna use sexualization as a device, then be adult enough to handle all the different reactions you're going to get without getting perpetually offended. I guarantee most guys are called 'fragile' when they express any of the kinds of reactions featured in this video. On the flip side, I maybe could characterize you (or women who share your ideas) as people who see sexism everywhere and try to push the narrative that women are perpetual victims at all times in our culture, with no hope of recourse. And I think that's a crock. And one more time: you're not the content police. And I'm not telling any channel what to do - but rather QUESTIONING why they don't have a more equal approach. Feedback and comments are a quintessential part of the youtube community. Feminism is still not accepted, ever since women got the right to vote people think that feminism is no longer needed. But that's not true. I don't agree with the "feminazis" or any other feminist that hates men for whatever reason. I believe in social equality for both genders. And I'm not talking about the biological stuff, men and women ARE different on a biological note. Men have square fat cells while women have circular fat cells. Men tend to overheat because of their external equipment while women are externally cold because of our internal equipment. We are different and I think that's great! We're unique to each other . However, we should be socially equal because we are human. We're not different species, we are the same. Women are treated differently in the military than men and it's often sexist. I've had friends tell me that their 50 yr old mothers needed their uteruses removed but a male doctor kept it in so that they could have more children even though they are 50 and have had many children already. Which caused the mother to be in constant pain. I've met women whose husbands sent them to a psychiatric ward even though many psychologists confirmed that the woman is in sound mind, she had just been abused by said husband.I want women to be made to go on the drafting lists like men are made to. I don't want my little brother to go to war. I want a woman president (not Hillary, fuck no)to be in office someday in my lifetime. Hawkfeather I applaud your objective, rational stance on the true definition of the word "equality". However, I disagree that we "have a long way to go". For cultures other than the West, this is very true. But in Western culture, specifically the US, social differences in regard to gender have significantly narrowed. Single women in the largest cities in the US are, on average, earning higher salary than single men in the same cities. Does this differ when factoring in maternity leave/having children? Absolutely. But even when this is factored in, most of the differences can still be explained by reasonable causes. I've worked at 3 different enterprise-level businesses, and 2 out of the 3 offer paid maternity leave and have a general preference of hiring women over men for various positions. In my first position as a graduate, I was paid less than my female counterparts in the exact same role who only had roughly 6 or 8 months more in tenure than me, which I was perfectly fine with. After about a year and a half, however, I was able to do the job faster and more efficient, and successfully negotiated a pay raise because of that, which many women choose not to approach.Men will always be protective and caring over women, as it is in their biology. A growing number of women see this as appalling, when in reality it should be valued. That is how many animal species have survived and grown over the years. Men also enjoy being cared for by women, although some will never admit this. But for this same reason, many men do not want women to be forcibly drafted, because we are meant to protect them. Our survival as a species also depends upon the survival of women.As for the issue of male doctors and refusing to remove uterus, this sounds like a very unique and uncommon case, but I would always urge for people to research both sides of a story. Have they sought second opinions from other doctors ? Additionally, although it is possible for a spouse to send his or her partner to a psychiatric ward, there are several conditions that must be met, such as eye-witness testimony, and the person signing the petition would need to prove beyond reasonable doubt that the partner is in need of psychiatric assistance, so unless those women falsely admitted to their alleged behavior, and an independent psychiatrist documented it as being authentic, there's simply no way this would happen. There are far too many conditions that have to be met. Otherwise, people would send anyone they didn't like away to a psych ward for no reason. Sexist Note: There is nothing toxic about being masculine. I rather dislike the term "toxic masculinity" because it insinuates that there is something inherently wrong with being masculine, and therefore being a man. I find this to be a sexist slur on what it means to be a man, much like the "masplaining" term used by feminists. If you are putting the word "man" in front of a negative behavior someone is doing, then you are making a sexist implication based on a stereotype of men's behavior. For example: If I told you that you were " woman nagging" or " woman over exaggerating" or even " woman gossiping" you would call me a sexist, and honestly you'd have every right to. So, my question is why is it not sexism when we do this to men? This is a basic point of hypocrisy that I have against feminism (I am sure you are a great person who wants equality, but I am also sure you know what I am talking about with these terms). Joshua Fyfe i have seen many feminist posts supporting men and raising awareness regarding male abuse, supporting body positivity, and accept all types of men, no matter if they're gay , trans, and so on. They have also called out women who beat, murder and rape. There's a difference between feminists and misandrists. Feminism fights rape culture and cares about the lgbtq community, not demonizing men. I may not be as educated regarding wage gaps, but I am a feminist because I know that that's not the only issue that feminists fights for, and I wholeheartedly support them. Vanilla Garce it's incredibly naive to think that most feminists act in a civil and respectful manner towards men, or people in general. You seem like you are a decent person and you mean well. But you are not very aware of the people in your own cause.And your point about toxic masculinity, makes very little sense. It's a sexist term. Why don't people say "toxic femininity"? Because saying toxic "X" insinuates that there is something inherently wrong with "X" behaviour. But it's okay to be sexist towards men, just like it's okay to be racist towards white people... Mike S - I could not agree more. I think that the term feminist has good intentions, but the feminists I have met or seen have treated me like garbage because of my gender . There is NO rape culture in the United States. Rape culture exists in underdeveloped countries and the middle east. Rapists go to jail here and I have never met someone who is "pro rape". Yes, some criminals beat the system, but as a country we hate rapists.	Gender	Gender - General	1/81	1.235
Joshua Fyfe rape culture is always a thing no matter where we come from. It doesnt only include rape, but also sexual harassments and assaults. I'm glad that you hate rapists, but I'm preeeeetty certain it occurs in America as well. Harvey Weinstein is only one out of the thousands and thousands of people out there. I'm not saying that all men are rapists, or that no men get raped. I'm saying that... I dont even remember what I was gonna say Anyways, point is that rape culture exists everywhere, and something should be done. There's this consent class in Nairobi, Kenya that managed to drastically reduce rape crime by half, which is highly inspiring.	Sexual	Gender - General	1/116	0.862
It's sad to see that Niece looks like a decent person who wants equality of genders and still can't see feminism errors and contradictions, as she don't seem to acknowledge the claims of Mike S, she just takes his questions and talk about it like if Mike didn't make a question or refute the things she said after."Wage gaps doesn't exist, here's why" -> Then she talks about not having faced the wage gap, but she neither acklowledge what he said."Toxic masculinity is sexist, why feminists use this definition?" -> She doesn't answer the question and also uses the sexist word.And so on.... Please, Niece, if you are actually reading this, acknowledge the nonsense of some of the feminism claims, and try to acknowledge them to others, or this shit will became a sex fight. Changing out the action packed male roster with a bunch of passive women who just sits in the backseat and complaints 90 of the movie is a huge change to this fictional universe. Do men bitch and moan about Chris Ewans getting questions about his workout and diet? I'm just gonna say I don't exactly agree with the whole sexism thing. Before you chew me out, I want to say that currently, sexism is directed at a certain gender , specifically males. Sexism happens to both sexes, male & female. Yes, it does happen to women much more often than men, so it's understandable if the word ' sexism ' just immediately reminds you of a guy who's at fault. However, it's WRONG to think that it just happens to one gender , and that it's NOT sexism if the position is reversed. It's kind of the same situation with rape. If a guy raped a female, then he would be thrown behind bars, but if a woman did it, it might be shrugged off. I just don't like how some words are directed at a specific gender , like how feminists HAVE to be women. I am sure there are plenty of men out there who vouch and campaign for equal rights of BOTH genders, both male & female. The point that I'm really getting at is equality. If we all want equality, we have to stop pitting one against another. We have to STOP GENERALIZING. I know some people might describe me as "butthurt", but honestly, this is nothing about being butthurt. This is about society progressing forward with a better future in mind.Thanks for reading my rant.	Gender, Nothing, Sexism, Woman	Age - Youngsters, Gender - General	9/228	3.947

Do the owners of this channel realise that by having this channel, a channel defined by femininity, put up videos adds to the unnecessary gendering of these issues and to the systematic sexism you'd think a video like this would be protesting. By uploading a video on a channel called "Ms. Mojo" about sexism it adds to the already poisonous idea that sexism is only a female's issue, whereas it is the people's issue and can be experienced by anyone of any gender and should be fought by everyone. There is absolutely sexism on both sides and you're right, I've never approved of those situations where male stars are touched without their consent. However, the difference lies in how society views them after said incident. Chris Hemsworth is regularly thirsted after but is still seen as a serious actor with the benefit of his looks. Women face situations every day where they are treated like objects, but there's that knowledge that much of the world views them as such. So before you make those assumptions, actually look at the facts.	Sex, Sexism	Gender - General	3/92	3.261
Jessica Cortez Sexism is a far far more complicated thing than you seem to think it is. There aren't protests for men because men do not experience sexism at the same level women do/have experienced. It's bizarre to me that anyone still thinks men experience as much. Im not saying sexism towards men doesn't exist. But if you actually read about the history of the world, sexism towards women is much more prevalent. Just because it's better doesn't mean sexism towards women is extinct. Some people may not like what I'm about to say, but the US at least is dominated by mostly white men. It's just the truth. Almost every singly one of our presidents has been white and male. And all are male. Congress is mostly made up of them. I'm not saying those are bad things and that those people in power should be ashamed of that. But those are reasons why feminists focus on womens rights.	Sexism	Gender - General	5/160	3.125
Sophie Luvs Books I have gone through the history books. Do you want me to educate you about how men were always the disposable sex and women the superior preserver? Sophie Luvs Books give me one thing the feminist movement has done to prevent sexual harassment against women and men in the past ten years?	Sexual	Gender - General	1/25	4.0

Sophie Luvs Books ok one, you just white shammed and commented a sexist and misandrist attitude toward our presidents. Not to mention racist. White men are not the problem. Society is the problem. You wanna know why it's weird to see men report sexual harassment? Because society has integrated the notion in mens minds that it's ok to get harassed and even assaulted because you're a man and you should like it. You wanna stop sexual harassment? Start by stopping the feminist movement. They do not care for the rights of women, they care about the fight to de-moralize society and have actually approved of men begin de-masculinized. You wanna know why women get harassed? Because of feminists. Feminists have pushed forward the idea that men don't need to be a gentleman and defend women because a woman can do it herself. Sex has turned into nothing more than a random thing people do. It has lost all meaning and feeling and doesn't have any meaning behind it. Until society reverts back to the ways of men being allowed and encouraged to stand up and be a gentleman, women will continued to be harassed. Feminists don't like the idea of men being men because they feel that it reverts to stereotypical gender roles. White men are not the problem. Men in general are being brought up in a society that teaches that sex means nothing and women are being taught that you have to power to cry rape even though you have consent. You want change? Start with the feminists.	Gender, Nothing, Racist, Sex, Sexual, Weird, Woman	Age - Youngsters, Ethnicity - General, Gender - General, Physical Identity - Physical (and Mental) Impairments	10/260	3.846
Sophie Luvs Books and another thing too, if men do not experience sexual harassment, how do you explain a female fan grabbing harry styles crotch on stage? Ellen degeneres making a male actor strip? Joy bayheart touching chris hemsworths abs on tv? Female talk show hosts talking about the sexualization of women in movies yet they oogle people like chris Evans ass? Women are just as guilty of sexual harassment and until society figures that out, we are doomed. Men are victims of sexual harassment too, only difference is they are told that they're supposed to like it	Sexual	Gender - General	3/98	3.061
It doesn't always have to be about men jfc. Go watch a video about sexist questions men have been asked and leave this one alone. Jessica Cortez I totally agree that male stars experience objectification and harassment but when men are treated that way it is a rogue situation or person, with women it is systemic and very common . That is not entirely true I'm afraid. men face sexism too, but feminists are not entitled to fight this battle too. I know plenty of men and women who are annoyed by sexist questions which are addressed to men, but if men want to stop being objectified then they should unite and raise their own voice instead of hiding behind feminists and blame them for everything. I rarely see men fighting for women's rights	Sexism	Gender - General	1/67	1.493

+Jessica Cortez I didn't read this whole thread because it started to go the way of being petty, but perhaps I can offer you some things to think about. One thing straight off the bat- it is not the feminist's responsibility to advocate for men. Feminists can and do support men, but if you or anyone else has a problem with men not being supported enough, then you and or they are welcome to stand up against that. Don't expect other people to hold your values and fight for them in order to get your approval if you won't do anything for your values yourself. Next, yes, women experience sexism and sexual harassment and abuse much more than men do. That is something that needs to stop. The rate, frequency, and severity that men experience it worldwide and historically is astronomically dwarfed by how often and to what degree it happens to women. There's no two ways around that. Please don't try to minimize it by saying that it happens to men too as if that makes any sort of sexual mistreatment fair or acceptable. Lastly, your own examples against men also point to how little women are considered. Part of the reason that woman-on-man misconduct and crime is so easily blown off is because of how far below men women are still considered. Male celebrities being touched, made to strip, receiving pornographic images, and getting lap dances for people's amusement, these are not seen as bad for one main reason. It's just a woman who did it, and really what harm could a woman do? We are caring, small, and weak. I think that this is wrong and not remotely okay, but that is how general society views these things. More or less, women are sex objects to be pursued and used, not having many thoughts or desires of their own. That a guy got any sort of sexual contact from one could only be a plus (as is thought when female teachers start "relationships" with their male middle school students); it is something that the boy is congratulated on and told to be happy about. He not only used a woman for her purpose but got her to pursue him, early, no less. Now, I think that too is totally wrong and a terrible, traumatic violation compounded by a grave miscarriage of justice, but society at large still doesn't seem to think so. These reasons, not feminism, are why the sexual assault of males is so rarely talked about and so humiliating for the victims, particularly when perpetrated by a girl/woman. "That little thing took advantage of you? Ha! Come on, you know you wanted it. Wow, she touched your junk?! You should be happy, man!" Do you get what I'm saying? I hope so. :)

That is exactly the sort of bullshit the MRAs are bellowing to the rooftops. If men are being taught that 'sex means nothing ,' they're learning that from porn, which is an industry largely controlled and run BY MEN. NO-ONE is telling men they 'don't have to be a gentleman' (read some news sometime about all the recent crap with Harvey Weinstein and Kevin Spacey, and I think you'll find the consensus is we'd very much like men to be gentlemen again, thanks very much. Gentlemen, as far as I remember, don't assault and harass women and young boys - OR other men.)Oh, and if you ARE going to spout the MRA agenda, how about you at least have the balls to do it as your real self, instead of hiding like a baby behind a fake female persona? If this video were to cover every issue you hold near and dear to your heart, it would be way too long to sit through the whole thing. There are videos on men's sexual harassment. And if you want more protests for men's rights, organize one. What, did you think feminists got all their campaigns and protests wishing on a star? No, they got the fuck off the keyboard and marched through their cities to speak their minds and actually illicit change. The problem with a lot of these so called 'men's rights activists' is that they don't do shit but bully people who aren't talking about something they go through, as if they're the only people with those problems. how does history not prove that women weren't oppressed? like what class were you taking? women in greece were barred from participating in the olympics. in many european monarchies, a female couldn't be an heir, meaning that they could only really gain any power by marrying somebody who had it. gjadajg And to add, Women definitely faced way more discrimination than men. In American History, there is a thing called Femme Covert which basically covers the legal rights of a woman , they couldn't file for divorce, vote, speak on their own freewill, instead their voice is taken over or covered by their closest male relation (I.e. their father, brother or husband) and another thing to note is that Black Women even got it worse. In US history, not only did they experience the horrors of Slavery and Racism but their masters would sexually assault and rape them as early as the age of 13. So please, continue to say men are more discriminated but just to let you know, that's false	Age, Black, Racism, Woman	Age - General, Ethnicity - Black, Ethnicity - General, Gender - General	4/121	3.306

And Rlly think about it because for a long time now, Women were considered sex toys and objects to men. Men ruled. If we look at American History, There's no female leaders. When the Europeans came to settle in America and stole the Natives' land, and began creating a society, they had the ability to create and set rules for civilization. They were greedy as hell, they wanted the power to themselves and since they could, every law they made was so that no one else could overpower them so the laws installed would restrict anyone that isn't British from dominating and taking over. In fact, some people that are considered white today like the Irish and French weren't even considered white people Bc of their religious beliefs. The British that were in the America made it so that no one but themselves could control what happens. Also if you think life is sooooo much better for us answer these questions. Do you have someone telling you what you should be able to do with your body? Do you have someone trying to take away healthcare and medicines that are a necessity for your health and overall happiness? Do you have to deal with harassment, intimidation, and possibly physical assault when you just go out for a god damn walk? Do you have to deal with a barrage of sexist or belittling comments anytime you do anything? Do you have to deal with people constantly telling you you're triggered or stupid or a bitch for standing up for your fundamental rights? Do you have to deal with every thing in regards to your own body being shamed or sexualized? Girls and women are taught from a very young age that no matter what we do it's not right. Modern Savage25 actually I do think people in society try to address the issue of suicide and the differences in gender of course it's not handled well in my opinion and I think boys and young men still are somewhat forced to uphold the stereotype of being a strong man who doesn't cry and never shows weakness. Which is fucked up and wrong. Men deserve to have emotions and deserve to feel valid. That's not my point though, my point is that someone regardless male or female or whatever in between make a choice whether or not to end their life. I know plenty of people male and female who endure horrible environments and aren't dead. Your environment can have a mental toll of course and should not be disregarded but no one is holding a gun to your head, no one is forcing you to jump. You have a sense of control. I was suicidal for years and was actually pretty damn close to dying but I have recovered because I chose to take my pain and experiences and make something out of it. No one has a choice whether or not they get hurt or experience pain in this world but you do have a choice what you do with that pain. Happiness is not something that's given or even taken from somewhere it's made. EMILY GRAY feminism is not equality in itself, it is an approach towards equality that focuses on getting more rights for women, egalitarianism is also an approach towards equality, just focusing on maintaining equality that is already pretty much there. I'd say feminism is absolutely wonderful and beneficial for places where women are abused, mutilated, sacrificed and unsupported by the legal justice system, but in places like America or Australia where the current problem is not political, but subjective it merely serves as a pendulum swinger that is a threat to the maintenance of gender equality. If we keep pushing for more rules for women where the rules are the same it will eventually lead to misandry and will lead to a system where men are mistreated and have limited rights, basically a reverse repeat of history	Gender, Misandry	Gender - General	2/137	1.46

I can tell you how women were not really unprivileged as many people claim. You can see from the definition that it is about the woman's perspective of what privilege or equality is, and thus feminism is not about equality but about what a woman's perspective which they thought was denied to them. It is a movement based on misinterpreted history and forced blaming of natural laws onto a gender group.Also, as the other person just said, ideologies are not words but actions. So you're saying that men back then & now don't see a person when they see Helen Mirren, but see an object like a remote control or a hat. That's pretty insulting to just assume that's what most men think. I'm a male, I watch movies & listen to music made by women & I never once thought to myself, "this woman is akin to a shoe or a cell phone." And I wouldn't expect that out of the vast majority of men, because most men are good & are deserving of respect & recognition, something feminism never wants to address nor cares to honor. Rihanna summed up feminism the best, "I'm not looking for a man, let's start there." Pretty much sums up what feminism has to offer men.	Woman	Gender - General	1/130	0.769

You have to bear in mind that the interview was in 1975 and Parky was already a bit old fashioned even for then. Add to that his working class Yorkshire ’speak-as-I-find’ upbringing in a time when that meant something, and I am prepared to look upon this mindless objectification of Mirren as sad and pitiful, in the sense that I almost feel sorry for him. He simply doesn’t realise what he is doing wrong. No conscious misogyny either - just a dinosaur who knows no better and made a fool of himself. What is less forgivable is the fact that he stubbornly insists he wasn’t being sexist even to this day, and tries to blame her for derailing the interview because she doesn’t like him, rather than it being a reasonable response to moronic question. I was a child/teenager in his heyday, and I never much liked him or his show. As repulsive as Parkinson’s line of questioning is in this video, there was sadly ’a lot of it about’ at the time. Is not that. Women and men are different in their gender characteristics normally, but also certain men would be weaker or beaten by certain women. So is more about how to respect others and not treat them like objects. Is all I believe most people expect. Not to be "fit" in a mold you put them because of preconceived ideas. You know Elizabeth, queen of England during Tudor period? She did a phenomenal job as a ruler, better than many of her male contemporaneous counterparts did. If she was totally stopped from ruling (as many men wanted at the time, because men = better in EVERYTHING or so they believed, and that is what most women fight against), who knows what the future of England would have been. Everybody should be free to pursue their interests and natural qualities. Is all that is fair. Nobody is claiming men are worse or better in all senses. Is great, men should be strong, defend our country, etc. What is wrong with that? Most women are not denying your strength. Praising and supporting women achievements don't mean men also don't have their strong points. In general, is easier for men to put on muscles, but that also depends on specific genetics. Do you know they just found out a wealthy powerful viking warrior that was supposed to be a man, was actually found out to have been a woman (through genetic testing)? So, women can be warriors too, maybe not all women are predisposed for that, but forcing women into roles because it has to be like that, is unfair and also damaging to society. She was quite a risque actress at the time who played a number of sexual roles and she did not shy about going nude for these roles. That’s all fine, her life her choice, but the context of this interview is being misinterpreted to the ultimate extreme. Yes they were rather personal and in today’s time, considered offensive, but the question being asked is ”How serious do you want the viewing public to see you as a talented actress if the roles you play and choose rely heavily on your looks and sexuality as opposed to how you develop character?” At the time of this interview was done, I can see this as questions within reason. izzat irfan the fitness questioning is not sexist in nature. It's how often it was asked to that makes it sexist. Actresses were asked about fitness and dieting far more often than actors who were asked more so about their skill as an actor and their opinions on the role. Red Daikini - I followed your advice and checked out the Red Pill film. It's okay except it could dig much deeper, in fact it is extremely shallow in its analysis of the movement, and also the fact it bears the same name as a notorious hate group which seems rather deliberate since the Red Pill MRA group came first and had already gained infamy a few years before the film was even out. It's basically the equivalent of giving a film about Christianity the same name as the Westboro Baptist Church. Some of the things the Red Pill group say are truly disgusting such as 'Women are children. They seek out boundaries. They require the men in their lives to define and enforce these boundaries. And just like children, if women are not given boundaries, they will occupy the space they are given and become terrible, unruly brats.' Roxane Barker – First of all, I commend you most sincerely for taking the time to check that out. I'm rather shocked that someone actually did :-))I found the film pretty balanced in its presentation (giving plenty of mic time to the "blue pill" faction), and thought it brave on the part the filmmaker to be willing to critically examine and reevaluate some of her deeply rooted beliefs, especially since doing so would likely get her excommunicated and excoriated by rabid feminists and other Progressives (as, indeed, it did). Also, I strongly suspect that the title wasn't simply a reference to the eponymous MRA movement, but rather that it was named after the much broader Red Pill phenomenon – the sort of counter-zeitgeist that's been growing in response to the cultural inroads made by Third-Wave Feminism, identity politics, globalism, and other branches of Postmodern Cultural Marxism.As for the particular MRA opinion you cited, I can understand why it might make you bristle a bit, but it does make some sense to me that each gender (or sex , if you prefer) might be designed to play some vital role, to serve some crucial function for the other (beyond procreation, I mean). In short, we're meant to complement one another. Otherwise, what would be the point of a binary species? Why not have just evolved into a unary species that reproduces asexually (which, admittedly, would simplify things, but would also make existence a lot more boring)? And maybe that's where we're ultimately headed, but, in the meantime, we're stuck with each other, and it would be nice if we could achieve some kind of détente, or rapprochement... mathsisdeadtomenow I keep telling people just use the word egalitarian instead it's equality for both sexes which is important because modern feminism just hates men and it disgusts me. Modern feminism has completely ruined the word also on the most part most modern society's are fine with equality and that's why say like America doesn't really need it as much anymore and we should focus on other countries where women are actually oppressed more frequently such as Afghanistan, Iraq, any Muslim country, Russia, Africa in some areas etc. not being racist by the way I'm just talking about the society's in some areas that literally kill women if they wore shorts on a 40 degree Celsius day, or not being able to drive or go to football games without a man which in some Muslim countries is starting to change so that's really good to see that they are becoming more accepting of differences and giving woman more rights	Racist, Woman	Ethnicity - General, Gender - General	2/159	1.258

They embody true feminism.	Patriarchy	Gender - General	1/117	0.855
DODECAHEDRON! - Well I can explain to you why toxic masculinity is bad in the same way as I did to my Tory voting father. One aspect of it is that it encourages men to conceal their emotions when they are upset. There are various examples of how society does this such as how boys are frequently told from a fairly young age to stop being such a girl when they are crying. Also men and boys who get upset and they aren't mourning someone are told to stop being such a pussy , and there is Britain's most widely read media source, The Daily Mail, occasionally publishing articles that criticise men who cry and says that they are weak, unattractive and pathetic. Many men take this on board and can either become aggressive when they are upset about something, or they simply bottle it up completely. At present the suicide rate for males in Western countries is 3-4x higher than females. This is directly linked. Despite this according to reports females experience suicidal thoughts at a higher rate. Many males with depression fail to admit it or to seek help. The members of the APA believe that it is a result of their upbringing and therefore agree with the belief that the way society encourages men to mask their emotions and the suicide rate are directly linked. Red Daikini - Well what I mean by it doesn't dig deep enough is that there were people who were interviewed who have controversial opinions but those weren't touched upon, also the dark side of the movement wasn't covered. People who look for the Red Pill are going to find the group in search engines. It would be a good idea to steer people away from that group and also Incel (the members on there occasionally talk about 'going Elliott' which means committing mass murder like Elliott Rodger).Trust me a lot of what the Red Pill group says are horrible lies. They say that all women will cheat if they have the opportunity when many women wouldn't dream of cheating. They also say women are naturally emotionally abusive and manipulative when many are extremely straightforward. And there is also this quote 'I would rather not see these kinds of 'gay, redpill and proud ' posts. Masculinity is in part defined by our attraction to the feminine. If your preference is to be a man-pleaser then you're not expressing any kind of masculinity that is worth celebrating.' Roxane Barker toxic masculinity doesn't exist that's why I put it in quotation marks. Biologically men are less prone to emotion than women. That's just a fact. We express ourselves less because we don't feel the need to. As for the suicide rate, factors that might be responsible for it include: losing 90 of all child custody battles, a higher rate of homelessness, divorce, occupying the majority of the worlds unpleasant manual labor jobs and a high domestic violence rate but next to no shelters to name a few. The suicide rate isn't just because of emotional repression. Labelling masculinity as "toxic" is an incredibly stupid thing to do. Without masculinity we would all be swinging from trees flinging shit at each other. Masculinity is good for men but it needs to be taught from one man to another without the intervention of women. Do I think men have a place to comment on femininity? No! I know nothing about femininity and womanhood so it's hardly my place to comment on it. So why is it acceptable for women to insult masculinity and label it "toxic"? The answer is that it's not and masculinity needs to be left to men. Just like womanhood needs to be left to women.	Nothing	Age - Youngsters	1/209	0.478

Roxane Barker There are several reasons why the male suicide rate is so high. I already pointed out several of them in my previous comment but here are some more anyway: alcohol , men are more likely to have a severe drinking problem which can lead to them making irrational decisions such as suicide, financial problems, relationship breakdowns, fearlessness about death, physical insensitivity to pain and the fact that we have a greater capacity for suicide. What I mean by that is that it is proven that men choose methods of suicide that are more effective EG: hanging. I'm not going to deny that emotional repression and lack of communication are reasons for the high male suicide rate but they're not the only reason. And they're not attributable to "toxic masculinity". I need to say though Roxane that I am incredibly impressed. Most feminists I debate can't stand five minutes before they crumble, but Jesus you've put up a good argument . Well done.	alcohol	Behavioural Addiction - Alcohol	1/163	0.613
Roxane Barker I never said that men are biologically more inclined to commit suicide. I said that biologically we are less prone to emotional responses. Now your original point was that the higher male suicide rate is as a result of toxic masculinity discouraging men from communicating about their feelings. I've already gone through so many alternative points that I don't think I need to again. So instead I will ask you why the male suicide rate is highest in the western world? In Europe in particular. The west is the most progressive and has taken great strides to dismantle "toxic masculinity" which as you say hurts men. So it stands to reason that all of this progressiveness in getting rid of such a harmful thing as toxic masculinity would have helped cut down the high male suicide rate. Right? So why is it that the progressive west still suffers the most from male suicide? Could it be that maybe toxic masculinity isn't responsible and perhaps doesn't even exist? Could it be that the variety of other factors might play a part? Since we've begun dismantling those oppressive gender roles everything should have been fine and everyone happy and fulfilled and independent. So why aren't our men happy? Actually why aren't our women happy? If I recall correctly female happiness is at an all time low... in such a progressive area of the world why aren't we all happier? Roxane Barker But in 3rd world countries the man that brings bread to the table get some pussy as reward.No matter how much bread a man in western society brings to the table. Please explain how a higher percentage of females than males that committed suicide previously contacting mental health professionals helps your argument. They still committed suicide. If anything, it shows that seeking help doesn't work. Also, women attempt suicide at higher rates than men. Men just succeed more often because of the methods they choose. Women have no problems expressing their emotions and they try to kill themselves more. Knowing that, what makes you think that men expressing more emotions will help reduce the amount of male suicide? Your take on men and emotions is flawed. Men are not taught to not express emotions. They are taught that there is a time a place to do it. The main reasons why boys are told to stop crying are usually either because the thing their crying about is stupid and not worth crying over. For example, falling off your bike and scraping your knee. Or because others may need to rely on them in a future bad situation. For example, a guy with his girlfriend are walking down the street at night when someone holds them at gunpoint. Crying from fear isn't going to help in that situation. I would really like to see your evidence that a guy mourning someone would be called a pussy . Yes, a large number of males and females have potential triggers. Why is it that you can only be bothered to mention some of the female's triggers in your post and none of the males? Are there no dark sides of feminism? Do you believe people should steer clear of feminism because of them as well?	Mental, pussy	Nationality - Chinese, Physical Identity - Physical (and Mental) Impairments	2/270	0.741

Ari, you sing about sex all the time but you cannot handle the consequences when some of your listeners tries to ask you for date! It is terrible if someone asks you for date in the streets! I am glad there are other kind of women who don’t think men as entertainers. You don’t have to throw shit on everyone who tries to make a connection with you. BOTH men and women are sexual, deal with it! I don’t have trouble when Selena Gomez or Nicki MInaj sings about sex but your hypocrite opinions are the worst, Ariana! Your comments are very similar - maybe you are just a robot!!!I give very much respect for women and men who actually are for equality and not some fake shit feminism. I gotta say, I think is out of place. Yes, ”female hygiene” is still a taboo, so much that is still called like that instead of just saying the fucking period or menstruation, but just because is something that should be see differently in society I don´t think the way is to scream it, it´s still a body fluid. Remember, we men also have uncontrollable body fluid lost, it´s called nocturnal emission and even though woman can also have it, men have it more commonly even after puberty, and you will never see any men, whom I can assure has had nocturnal emissions in his life, boasting about or making a big deal of it. At least some woman talk about menstruation through arts, they give it a meaning, Amy here is just saying ”I got ma period today ladies” and she gets a ”you go girl”?? No.	Woman	Gender - General	2/148	1.351

Ungreatful Duck Sperm is a bodily fluid almost directly correlated with intercourse, regardless of whether or not it can be controlled. Menstruation isn't sexual (it's painful af) and does not end in orgasm. You don't here women talking about female lubrication (is there a better word for it? Seriously?). So I don't think sexual fluids should be talked about as openly, but menstruation has nothing to do with sex . It's on the same level as sweat. Dieting is such a TINY portion of health for teen girls though. In all honesty I was a tad chubby at 10, then got into sports and ate a lot of food for energy. Then when I hit puberty at like 12 my body evened out and for like the next 6 years ALL my weight gain was in my chest and butt. So like cartoonish hourglass for a few years. Then I toned up at like 18. I did not change my regime or anything just did sports i liked and ate to have energy to do it. Your body is changing so fast and it's the one time in your life where weight gain is actually technically GOOD for you. Dieting is dangerous at that point in your life unless your actually overweight. That of course is another issue. But like for the most part weight gain goes to good places before like 18. At that point your body needs to build up some fat . At the same time it's always important to eat high energy foods so that you FEEL like being active. Don't diet at under 18 unless your health problem is actually weight. Eat high energy and take up some fun activity. Biking, rock climbing, soccer, skating, basketball, chasing the neighborhood kids off your lawn. Your body will do the rest for you.	Chubby, Fat	Physical Identity - Physical Features	2/228	0.877

BigBlueBalls You just made the point for why it IS sexist. Why do you think girls care about those things so much? What, do you think it's genetic? That they are born that way? No darling, they tend to focus on those things because this culture... this MALE dominated (though perhaps not for much longer) culture... bombards their minds through attitude and advertising with the idea that they HAVE to care about that stuff or they will be shunned, overlooked, made fun of, ignored, unloved, and unworthy. Males are acceptable as themselves, how they are and who they are, a great deal more; females are not. Between males salivating over overly sexualized representation of females, multi-billion dollar industries relying on keeping females (especially young, impressionable females) buying their products through the use of highly manipulative and harmful advertising, and the constant perpetuation of idiotic sexist ideology around every corner of a girls life, of COURSE they tend to care about these things. Why is it boys are "okay with being fat and out of shape", why is it "they don't care"??? Because they aren't targeted by everything around them TO care. And even that's changing. Even males are being targeted by the market place to associate their self-worth with the superficial. It's been that way for awhile and it's getting worse, but it hasn't gotten as bad for them YET.
