I avoided this video the first time it was in my recommendations, given the kindve videos that you regularly see about sexism in the game industry.But I was really suprised to see a level headed video about actual events. Not a video about someone interpreting someones greeting as bigoted, racist , sexist...etc But real events in which you were actually descriminated against that I'm sure was a real eye opener for some.I particularly enjoyed this because most sexism against men is from other men as well from my experience and I think alot of people need to end the battle of the sexes and look at themselves and what prejudices they have. Same for me, but that's because there was a recent article about sexism in Riot Games and it was written by kotaku, and since kotaku is a joke I dismissed the whole article entirely.	Sexism	Gender - General	1/34	2.941
David O someone's greeting can be bigoted, racist or sexist though. I don't think you can just discount those stories, just because you decide it's not a big enough issue. If someone feels that something that has been said to them is out of line then there is a problem.	Racist	Ethnicity - General	1/50	2.0

It werent hardcore sexism like saying she was worse at a general skill because she was female for example a skill like like math or atheletics but back in 2010 the videogame area was even more "a guy thing" since 2010 to 2018-2019 girls have definately swayed the heavy generalisation of gaming being a guys thing (some female streamers fucking that over)but yeah in the first case it just sounded like a mom that rather would bang a Gamestop employee than actually buy somethingand the second was and elderly couple (the man alot more open minded) but its an old lady in a year that gaming were more domiated by guys and had an even more men as front figures for gaming than now so for an old person to want a doods opinion wouldnt sound that wierd even though she just sounded like she was a jealous harpy	Elderly, Old, Sexism	Age - Over 65s, Gender - General	4/151	2.649
seemeezz your right it can, people can do and say bad things and make mistakes. But it's also wrong to be so cynical that you would view the majority of things said from a racist or sexist perspective. Nobody is perfect, everything varies by situation and there are times when a remark is meant to be offensive and in that case it's clearly wrongBut right now in our culture outrage is profitable and it has created a culture for unwarranted and unprovoked hostility to innocent people who never hurt anyoneIf a person thinks about race and gender soooo much that they can't fathom how an innocent comment isn't an attack... Then really, who is the bigoted one?TL;DR Both sides can be wrong, people are people	Gender, Nobody, Race, Racist	Age - Youngsters, Ethnicity - General, Gender - General	4/128	3.125

ok butreferring to certain events as "actual" or "real" is incredibly dismissive of other events-especially when you're deciding to judge rather than just listen. if you don't experience bigotry, racism , or sexism , is it really that hard to understand that you may have inherent biases that affect how you view other people's experiences?deciding to mistrust people who point out unfairness or injustice is counterproductive. if people are telling you that a problem exists, scoffing at them helps nobody . Dzumeister because alot of the other claims are not real, and it is the fault of people being so ready to throw out serious words like sexist, rapist, rape and Nazi towards innocent people that the general public has become desensitized to them And on the point of realizing that I have my own bias, I do we all do and that's what my top comment was about. And have experienced sexism from men and women I wore makeup and had hair to my lower back all throughout high school. Guys that do that get a lot of shit and managers in small towns don't love that sorta thing, but I don't parade my victim points around because that's people and people suck.The way we react to people who cry wolf is a real psychological phenomenon and if we want to really destroy sexism , racism , or any bad thing that there is in the world we have to stop turning serious issues into a laughing stock to the general public If you call everyone a murderer, nobody will believe you when you see a murder... MsAbixxx I addressed this in a response to another comment earlier... It probably looks like I'm obsessed with this because I keep replying, but really I just want to make it known to the people leaving intelligent comments that are intended to be taken seriously that I am open for real discussion and debate.I could really do without a flame war as I really don't want to take time out of my day for something like that but I do feel that at the end of the day if I can have a meaningful interaction with someone and end up making both of us think about another point of view that I have done some good I know that's dramatic and sometimes I do enjoy being dumb in YouTube comments, but social issues like these are something I'm very passionate about.As far as my definition of real, I mean just that. Factual, as in they actually happened. I don't deny that sexism does happen so please do not try to misconstrue my words. But I also don't deny that many find sexism where it doesn't exist and claim it is there, sometimes ruining peoples lives on the process. And if you don't here of both scenarios happening chances are you get all your news from one place and don't look at anything outside of your political bubble. (Which is very easy given the stupidity of a two party political system)	Dumb, Sexism	Gender - General, Physical Identity - Physical (and Mental) Impairments	3/242	1.24

John Kushmer But her actual stories didn't put down women as a whole by merely honestly pointing out women were sexist to her, and no women are interpreting it as a dig at women. So it's not really reasonable that had her stories been about two sexist men, you'd feel personally attacked. It's ok for anyone to call out sexism as long as they don't attack whole genders over the behavior of individuals. I haven't seen any stories of sexism on YouTube where all men were attacked so maybe... stop taking such stories about men personally like they're about you or all men. That's not fair to people with stories of sexist encounters with men. No one should have to hide their story of sexism because members of the gender it's about will get unreasonably upset.	Gender, Sexism	Gender - General	4/136	2.941

David O It's fascinating to see how males are irrational and illogical hypocrites. If it was a woman saying she was discriminated by males you would probably call her a crazy feminazi crying about first world problems who is simply lying or she just misinterpreted something a man said because she is a misandrist or some BS like that. But because the video is portraying situations where women were sexist towards another woman, men are here saying the video is great and calling the video "level headed about actual events" lol. A fat cat from sweden But is it unfair to completely dismiss someone else's experiences of sexism based on the fact that this particular incident was perpetuated by women?Women of course can be sexist, there is no debating that. That is a fact. But this comments wording kind of suggests that this particular incident was an 'ACTUAL event on REAL sexism ', suggesting that other experiences where women experienced sexism at the hands of men is somehow not real. And that any such experiences are immediately judged as false or untrue based on pure assumptions rather than evidence.It seems like if this video was about a woman experiencing sexism at the hands of men, many here would just immediately assume that it was not true. Or that perhaps the video maker is just a triggered snowflake exaggerating events and who hates men.Which is kind of sad.Yes these incidents were perpetuated by women, but praising this as an event of 'ACTUAL sexism ' and immediately assuming all of these other women were lying is a terrible stance to take. I am so perplexed by this, it is so odd to me to think of someone doing that. From what little work I've done in retail, I have run into a few examples of the north end of a south bound skunk, but never that blatantly prejudice. Come to think of it though, I did encounter something like this from my neighbor once, directed at her own granddaughter of all people. I'm decently handy with tools, so my neighbor asks me to help out with a set or eyeglass screwdrivers. I grab my set and walk over to her home and her granddaughter needs to swap out a laptop battery. Her granddaughter is only a couple years younger than I am, and from the few interactions we've had, she knew eons more about computers than I do and is way more qualified to do this, just lacking the tools. She goes to take the screwdriver set and her grandmother insists that I do it since I'm a guy and I apparently "know about these things", so she's forced to sit there and watch while I puzzle over how to open this thing without breaking it to replace the battery. I tried asking her for help a couple times, but it was so weird , like her grandmother thought that if she touched it it would stop working. most of the sexism i lived as a gamer in my life were on game chats or like... with friends of my friends? like... I often got told on gta back when i got my xbox360 i was like... 12? or 13? and GTA5 was kinda new and it was actually my first game 100 online with people i didn't knew? (i mean... i played a lot of minecraft, perfect dark remaster and other game i was playing online with ONLY friends of mine) but i mean... it was almost the first time i was meeting so much random players and it was kinda scary at this point to join a random chat and having to speak english (considering im french) and like... REALLY OFTEN i was insulted for being the girl of the group? they were asking me to go back in the kitchen or you know... make them a sandwich... or even they called me bad name u knoooooow and anyway... it was feeling really bad for young me trying to have fun and just... learning that apparently, because im a female i was not supposed to play video game? i mean... ok?and in real life i ALSO got a looot of comments from girls? both girls and boys. i mean... everyone kinda have this cliché about only boys being sexist but no? at school multiple girls were saying to me that i was going to die alone and that boys doesnt like to date kiddo, they like mature womans? but i was like... WHAT IS THE POINT? XD its not because im a gamer that i am not mature? and i mean... if you actually consider video games being an immature activity, you actually consider that all gamer boys are immature too? so... why as a mature girl i would date an immature boy anyway? better being both immature at this point ;) but with all that said... this is just really insulting to not be recognized as the person we are in general... i prefer playing video games as a girl and seeing a boy put makeup on than not doing what i really love.	Sexism	Gender - General	1/360	0.278

I think, through my own experience, that it was rather because you were a young person back then, that these women didn't see you as a reliable seller, than because you're a woman... I wouldn't talk about sexism because, with what you tell us, there's no real proof of it, maybe they weren't thinking that way and discriminate you only because you were young ?Also I experimented this too, but because I worked with my mom, It wasn't sexism . But cause she looked obviously older than me, people used to think that she was more professional (which was the case by the way but...). Of course she knew more things than me about the products that we were selling, but I remember one time, a client asked me some details about one plant that we were selling, I tried to answer his question and I did quite well, but because I was young and may be I didn't give him the informations with enough self-confidence, he did ask the same question to my mother WHILE I WAS STILL STANDING THERE (and of course she did answer the same as I did hehehe).Just to say that, may be these women weren't trusting you in the first place because you were young (and maybe then, because you are a woman ), the other sellers could have looked more reliable because they were older and more professional. I love how absolutely surprised you seem that a woman could be sexist. Yeah, sorry everyone, ALL people can be quite stupid. When I did tech support for a cable company, I'd get this phrase from women ALL THE TIME, either: "Oh you're a guy, tell me about the sports packages", or "I'm a woman , I don't understand these sports packages". The best one was the couple, such a common problem for employees but such a comedic one. The wife that's sexist in front of the non-sexist husband. Oh this is SOOOOOOOO common ! I'm a manager where I work now, and I'm a guy. What's really funny is when a wife will drag her husband up to me, ask me about cars, and I point them to the TINY LITTLE BITTY woman who could easily BUILD a car and the woman replies with some sexist remark like, "No we need a /man who knows about cars". Meanwhile I don't know dick about cars, other than that the employee who I originally pointed them to is a car fanatic.	Common, Woman	Gender - General, Social Class - Working class	6/178	3.371

I'm a female gamer myself and yes, mostly females are worse than males in terms of sexism. Once, I was shopping in a male clothing shop to buy a white shirt: Basically, I couldn't find one that i liked in females shops cause, they were all with details like flowers, embroidery etc and I just wanted a plain white shirt, as simple as that. I go to the shirt section and, basically I don't know anything about the specific sizes male shirt could have(and all the shirts were packed). But the only seller present is a women. First, she looked at me really weird, then, I asked her what I wanted. She grabbed me an oversized (like XL) ugly shirt for me to "try their smallest size". I saw between it a nice, small shirt, plus it was white. I asked: "And this one, it seems it would fit me perfectly." She was looking at me more and more with disgust and I couldn't know why. She said roughly: "No, try this one." Pushed me to the cabins with this horrible thing and made me wear it. I feeled so out of place and humiliated, like I, as a female had no right to buy something here. Plus, she gave me an already unfolded shirt some customer already put on: She didn't wanted to sell me anything in the first place, she didn't wanted to unfold one for me. Long story short, as all the sellers were females here and as I was shy at the time, I leaved. The same situation happened to me in another male store: The female seller was looking at me weird, like I shouldn't been here I leaved as quick as I could. In stores were male sellers are present, I was NEVER bothered, they helped me with finding me a fit shirt and been real nice to me.	Sexism, Weird	Gender - General, Physical Identity - Physical (and Mental) Impairments	3/315	0.952

I have seen some horrible sexism from other women in lots of things, but thankfully not while I was working for Gamestop, I was actually a regional manager for six stores during my time, and only twice ran into sexism . One time was a possible new hire, I'm interviewing this dude, it's going well. He has some prior experience in retail, he has a good way of wording things, speaks clearly and came in looking put together and freshly bathed. So I have him fairly high on my list of new hires. I thank him for coming in, since I have a few more interviews and several positions to fill I will be in contact by the end of the week. He should have said thanks and left, he would have had the job. Instead he starts telling me what I should do, and ends with "Well, I wouldn't expect much from a woman , it's why they should have had a man doing this" I crossed him off my list and tell him to leave. Dude had the nerve to complain to Higher ups that I was the sexist one. the only other time, I was working the floor, filling in (it was a seriously bad time for my stores, we lost a lot of people, the company made some horrible calls.. I was doing some serious overtime) when I see this young man debating the Xbox game line up, so I ask if he needs anything and he responds "Yeah, Someone who will actually know about games. not some girl" next to me was actually another customer, a teenage girl who looked ready to blow up herself. I was going to have a fight on my hands. I had several options, either hand him over to one of my other employees to deal with (most in this shop WERE girls) toss him out, smile and deal with it. I. Did. None. Of. This. I smiled brightly and slapped my hands on my face and went "OMG! I didn't think you actually existed!" Now, the girl beside me looks confused, the young man looks confused and nearby I hear one of my employees snort cause they know me. he says "What?" I indicated him "A fake gamer boy! Boys who still think girls don't play games. I thought you were just legend, like Bigfoot or unicorns" The girl cracks up, the guy goes red and says "I want to speak to your manager!" "Unless you want my district manager, I'm regional, how may I help you?" I don't think I could have grinned any wider.. Some people, doesn't matter the sex , will be so threatened by another of their same sex having more knowledge than them in a field that they will scoff and say the subject matter is best left to the opposite sex . Men are known to insinuate nursing is a "women's job". Some women who were brainwashed into believing such sexism will then state an engineering or mechanic job is best done by a man. For instance, NONE of my highschool friends would ask me for advice on their vehicles even though they KNEW I worked on my own car and was raised as my dad's "little helper" when it came to fixing all things mechanical. But then, all of my friends to this day will call me for advice on animal husbandry. Sure I DO have a lot of experience with animals, but it seems both men and women are more likely to ask me about medical or other "soft" questions and very few ever call me up to ask about engineering stuff even though that is MY FRIKKEN DEGREE!Except for my elderly neighbors. Whenever they have a house maintenance issue, they call me up right away and I'm quick to come on over with my tools. So yeah, sexism CAN be perpetuated by the same sex . It is all about the perpetrator's lack of self-esteem and their inability to admit that others of their own sex can have knowledge and expertise that they lack. I feel sorry you had to deal with this. It is unfortunate that society still has this binary gender issue when it comes to knowledge and experience. That's really rude! I would never have thought you'd be the victim of that kind of sexism from women working there	Sexism	Gender - General	1/21	4.762
I think this is down to the women growing up in an environment where they have been taught what a woman's place is and what they can and can't do. It's mainly a generational thing but it's also a problem with people from certain countries or people who have a traditionalist family who have held onto the prejudices and preconceptions. As the decades go on it gets better but hasn't died out yet like other things have yet. I'm mean there are still racists who believe black people are less intelligent. In the end there are still people who will believe this prejudice bullshit. I also kind of feel sorry for those women as it means they don't think highly enough about there sex or gender to believe that they to can understand what some people call boy stuff. Even though back when game consoles were coming out they were pitched to the whole family. It was only the video game crash that forced companies to target children and then they only had the money to tragedy either boys or girls. In the end they chose boys. So in another world the games industry could have easily chosen girls as the target market for games consoles.	Black, Gender, Sex	Ethnicity - Black, Gender - General	3/206	1.456
Grillidan One of the biggest gaming markets for women are hidden objects games. And one of the core mechanics for hidden object games is puzzle solving. The reason why less women are interested in software development is that society tells them that women shouldn't be interested in software development. Common stereotypes influence people's choices.Also IQ as a measurement of intelligence is basically meaningless. It was invented to determine whether school children were ready to graduate to another class. The reason why it became as big as it got was that people just like the thought of an objective measurement for intelligence existing. The only thing that it tells you is that you are better or worse at solving the specific problems featured in the IQ-test.	Common	Social Class - Working class	1/126	0.794

Chloe Bywater Do you hear me complaining about the reason that they play better though?Do you hear me say its cause of some inequity that keeps me down?They play better(i just take your word for it by the way...i can only recall Lita Ford and Joan jett from your list) cause they practice more and cause music is actually their profession so they spend a lot of time and effort on it.So in order for your argument to be valid...is to hear me cry that they are better cause they are women and somehow there is a privilege attached to their gender that prevents me from reaching their level.So iam just not a sore loser darling and victimhood isnt my default state unlike you.	Gender	Gender - General	1/125	0.8

Chloe Bywater Lol....let me bring up a real example since you failed to do so....in science women dominate biology..and men dominate stem....the difference is that you dont hear men whine why women are so good in biology but you hear women whine about stem and that their failure to dominate is due to sexism ....Women guitarists on the same page are an overwhelming minority as far as electric guitar playing goes.....does that mean women cant play guitar? well no it usually means that most are not interested and passionate enough to pursue this.Thats not sexism that natural selection in play.In the end water sinks its own level in all aspects of life....thats why you ll find more female nurses than men..doesnt mean you cant find men that are absolutely great at that but they usually are not naturally inclined to purse that field...So there is a simpler answer for those claims..its called nature..if you have a problem....blame her.know though that its not wise to go against her cause in the end...she always wins. Chloe Bywater Well iam not very good if you compare me to professional players for sure.The problem with your assessment is that i somehow claimed to be a pro player and that is my day job.Please tell me where did you see that and ill agree with you...on the same page those players you mentioned are not even a footnote(even that is a stretch) to the great guitarists that are all men by the way...learn to compare spades to spades.I cant win over wnba players either...but then again iam not a basketball player just because i hoop every other year or so....but realistically those players are not even on the level of prepubescent boys(that actively pursue basketball)...let alone teens (iam not even talking about adult male players..thats simply an insult).See thats one more proof that you have an inferiority complex....you cant even handle straight comparisons to things you know you cant win...yes lets compare an 80 year old man and a twenty something woman ....you only like those kind of comparisons....Yes in CERTAIN THINGS the chances that iam gonna be better than you increase by an alarming rate....for example...you can train all you want in martial arts all your life and me chilling without any training drinking bear but if you fight me the chances you ll win ll be like 0.0000001 percent simply cause...nature.At some things biology and ..genes..are overwhelmingly in our favor....dont you agree? This makes me think of an argument I had with a (now exfriend) of mine. Wait, argument is the wrong word. It was more of, a sexist 'friend' of mine yelling at myself, my girlfriend, and another one of my friends about why he was right. It started when he commented on my Wonder Woman shirt I was wearing. He said 'I bet Wonder Woman is your favourite superhero, because she's a girl' I said 'actually, I really like Spider-Man and Black Panther, but the Wonder Woman movie might be my favourite movie because of the amazing representation, although the representation in Black Panther is really good too.' He just goes 'I don't like it when a character is a girl and it makes no sense' so my girlfriend and I just hesitantly asked 'when does it not make sense?' He lists off a bunch of super masculine, punch first, talk later characters and said 'it wouldn't make sense if they were girls' I said 'actually, that would be awesome' I won't go into it too much more, but he didn't let us get a single word in Like I said, I'm not friends with him anymore, I won't go into it, but was just causing me stress, and he was starting to get really offensive all the time	Black, Woman	Ethnicity - Black, Gender - General	5/219	2.283

Don't you love working with the public. XD for some reason you become less human when you are a minimum wage employee. Felt like the more older gals need to catch up that video games is not a "boy's toy" anymore.We get so busy demonizing the guys with thier lesser examples that we forget gals can be sexist too. I remember working for a convenience store and had to clean a days old defecation because according to my more older but capable coworker. It was a "man's job." She purposely ignored her job to wait for person with a different genitalia to do her job for her. Also she was signed up to stack ice but it was too unpleasantly cold, heavy, and dangerous so she waited for me or my other guy coworker to do it for her. Because it's "men's work." She was even more taller than me so I don't see how I could stack higher. There is more examples but gosh was she the worst.I eventually talked to my boss about it and I wish I did earlier. I didn't had to pick up her slack anymore after that.Ladies and gents don't be afraid of confrontation if you are being treated unfairly. Go to your boss and try to explain. Completely agree that your customers definitely shouldn't have judged your ability to recommend video games based purely on your gender , although I'm not completely convinced that is the only explanation as to what happened. You mentioned that you didn't own a proper console until you went for the job, so to a certain degree this could be a reason why people may have believed you less knowledgeable than a typical nerdy hardcore gamer. More likely, the lack off a proper staff shirt setting you apart may have contributed to people not having confidence in your ability (to help them). Anyway, there are just two possible reasons other members of staff were sought out over you that have nothing to do with your gender . You cannot presume peoples' intentions and reasoning behind decisions to be sexist, in the same way you cannot assume peoples' abilities regarding a certain job based on their sex . I had such a similar work experience at a game store that I worked at. From woman too. When she said "actually from women." instantly I was like "YEAH I KNOW RIGHT?" I actually had a woman look at me and go "We don't understand anything about this video games, right sweetie? Just goes over our heads" dead ass. not even joking. I was like I had to step away. Also, having woman come to me asking me "where are the girl games at" and I gesture to the entire store and say "right here. I've played almost all of them." Wow, this is so accurate it's painful. I work at the biggest chain of game stores we have in the Netherlands and Belgium, and I deal with this on a daily basis. Customers (male and female) who act totally surprised when I go into detail about the mechanics of a game. "Oh, you actually play games?" Well yes, they wouldn't have hired me otherwise... Or customers who completely bypass me and walk straight to my male colleagues (I'm the only girl in my team). Luckily I have amazing colleagues who can get just as worked up about this as I can, and they often put the offending customer in their place by saying "oh I'm sorry I happen to know nothing about this game, but my colleague here can help you out." or "She's the expert on Xbox, let me ask her." but I'm sure not everyone is that lucky. I am proud to say that the ratio of men and women working at our stores is heading towards 50/50 and I hope that in the long run that will make people see that girls are equal in every way to guys, also in the video game world. by FAR the most race/sex/class/group/etc-ist people I've ever met were all people who identified themselves as a part of a minority group, the idea of self-labelling seems to hold pretty true for most other prejudices too but you don't get quite the same level self reinforcement with anything else as you do with ethnicity , even religion usually doesn't manage to be that pervasive in a person's life since we're trained to try to make assumptions about how others are seeing us as a part of any activity remotely related to interacting with other people, which is pretty much all of them.... gender probably tops ethnicity by a fair bit in terms of prejudice but it is a LOT harder to piece it all out since so much of our social interaction structure is already in terms of gender interaction rules.oh! right: it could easily be that I mostly only notice any of this when I'm noticing the self-targeted motivation structures in people that I'm trying to interact with. Yeeaaaaaaaahhhhhh in all my 19 years of being a WAMAN majority of sexist comments towards me or others came from women who have the mindset of 'I'm a woman who abides my life by gender norms and stereotypes, therefore all women abide by these stereotypes or at least should.' I got a lot of crap for being active in male dominated sports such as competitive weight lifting (it's a big thing where I live), but not from the dudes. The dudes thought it was hella dope I could keep up with them. Nope, the people correcting me were mostly women asking me XYZ about whether I was concerned about appearing masculine, telling me to pick a more feminine sport, and those just straight up refusing to believe a girl could lift weights without toppling over and begging for help like the women of Victorian times.Side note: the majority of women I dealt with were in their thirties or older. I totally agree with the issue. I have noticed this women against woman issue basically everywhere. Even in books, this seems to a prominent issue. Not all writers are like this, but I always felt that books written by a woman (teen romance and the like) are highly sexist, while male authors usually portray most woman in the context of the story rather positive. I am a female who did work at Gamestop as a Christmas temp as well, and the staff are the coolest guys I know (hell, one was a Navy vet like myself, so we had a kindred spirit between us and one even told me of when and where the Switch was being sold. Thanks, Kyle, thanks Tanner, you guys are the coolest!)As odd as this seemed, none of the people I interacted with judged me that way, but I have seen it before...but instead of a female being put down, but being placed up above because she was a female gamer. Thankfully, all of the staff at my local Gamestops are very levelheaded and are great conversationalists (seriously, you'll be talking all day!) and treat everyone as equals. The only ones they don't seem to get is the parents that let little Timmy buy GTA 5. Them and close-minded people who are so sure of their "research" that they are right and the staff is wrong.I am sorry those two women were uber nasty to treat you like that. It's fascinating that older women seem to think ONLY men seem to know all about video games. It must be a generation thing...or didn't play as kids themselves.If a woman shows interest out of the norm of the fashion world, makeup tutorials, or doesn't mind blood or dirt on their knees, the women who ARE in that stereotype gender role look down at her because "she's not one of us." It's high school cattiness. Even in the Navy, I faced this, because I was that one female that LOVED all things video games and dirty jokes and aking the boys laugh. The women spread constant rumors about me because I wasn't one of them. Thankfully, I had my nerdy guy friends to keep me up when I needed it, but it still hurt. And to top it off, all of these women were MY age! Not older! It's very hurtful that we women are not...tolerable of other personalities within our gender.I'm not a girly-girl, but if someone is, I don't hate them (maybe be a bit stand-offish because my tomboy personality WILL clash with it, but will try to be nice). It really does suck that we as females CAN'T seem to get along and are within cliches in our own gender.Hell, if you are a girly-girl, fashion police, makeup artist, live-for-gossip, or totally tomboyish, I won't hate... but, if you hate on ME, then I do Simple as that.	Age, Gender, Tomboy, Woman	Age - General, Gender - General, Sexual Identity - Female homosexuality	6/425	1.412

So... Women... The worst kind of sexists at Game ? Whodafunkit?Although... Just a random thought here. That second one... The wife sees her husband talking to a very friendly and maybe attractive woman half or even a third her age ... She might have resorted to blatant sexism because she felt threatened. Us men usually aren't perceptive about these situations while they're occuring so she may just have wanted to get him away from you. Not defending her position or anything, I just thought it was a possibility. That it could be a reason why she reacted that way... or maybe I watch too many sit-coms...Though. That first one sounds like a typical "girls don't know teckie things" sexist. Combined with the usual entitled customer mannerisms...	Age, Sexism, Woman	Age - General, Gender - General	3/127	2.362
Really rude people either way, though in the second example, I'm wondering, maybe the wife wasn't just sexist for the sake of sexism , but first of all... jealous? As in, she deliberately used sexist language as a tool, but her underlying goal might have been to separate a bubbly, knowledgeable young lady from her attentively listening husband (granted, this isn't really something "distinct" from sexism , just as behaving in racist ways or saying racist things because you hope to get some advantage out of it - say you agitate against an ethnic minority so you can chase them out of town and take all their stuff - is ultimately just racism , regardless of what you "really" believe, deep down). Now that I think about it, that could go for the first example as well - maybe the mother was intimidated by another woman knowing so much more about these things than herself, while up until then, she had been comfortable to brush them off as just "guy things". In this case, she is using sexism to put another woman "back in her place" so she doesn't have to live with the idea that another woman might simply know more (in one particular field) than she does. This isn't quite the same as what you went through, but from my experience as a female gamer, women can often be very narcissistic and think that female gamers are "unlady-like" and " weird ". Women were much worse than men when I worked for GameStop! I don't know why it's like that. Everytime I'd call about a preorder and a woman picked up for a, "Mr Male Sir Man," they'd BERATE me for calling! "Who are you, whore!?" They'd go off on a tangent thinking I'm some hussy from a corner that their whipped manbaby gave his number to. Absolutely ridiculous. Moms are the worst though. Today I'm like "shrug Well, go on your way, then, I see you don't want help on the spot. Your problem, not mine." I've also had young guys fret over the fact that I know certain things they don't, because they're men and a girl shouldn't know better than them. women are fragile little flowers according to some of the people in society, and should know that their talents reside in cleaning, cooking, and making more fragile things like scarves and flower arrangements. women should prepare to be mothers, and promote their daughters to have the same gentle lifestyle. women should know that men are supposed to be the masculine ones, that they should know where they stand because "god said so" and that only men can do what they put their minds to, as long as it's nothing a woman does already. men are strong, cold, masculine figures, should know how to fix any situation, shouldn't cry often if at all, and should have skills in basic construction and repair, should have a good tolerance for alcohol , shouldn't be into other men because "god said so."the only people pushing this lifestle for both genders are those who are too scared of not being able to judge a person at first glance. women can hate, can fight, can call a more masculine girl "basically trans" even though she's pefect in her assigned gender , can accept that they're not supposed to– or even discouraged to like sports. all because they want the approval of the other disapproving males.fathers call their sons "pansies" just because their sons would rather draw and paint and be a little quieter and not be into sports. men can yell at each other that they're "too soft," just for the approval of disapproving women. but of course, there's shit like yelling at a twelve year old girl on fucking roblox telling her that she can't play this game because it's for "boys, sweetie" and when she stays and doesn't do the best job because she's just having fun, you yell at her again and ask her "why are you even here if you're not good at this game?" like you've never been new– which i've experienced, but doesn't make me any more sour towards men because i'm not a bitter, judging asshole.merry christmas, everybody. Yeah... that happens a lot. I'm a gamer myself (however I sadly don't work in the game related field.) I work in food. Anyways, we had a special promotion one month that involved the XBOX 1 or maybe it was the S, can't remember now.. anyways, at this point I had just been promoted to manager, so I didn't get to interact with customers anymore unless it was a concern, however I happened to be walking by a register when a woman and her son were asking the (FEMALE) cashier questions on how to win, how to compete to win the XBOX 1, however.. as soon as i walked by I noticed the woman look at me like I was a Knight in shining armor, and immediately I heard "Oh I want to talk to HIM." and she pointed at me, now I'm not one to turn a down a customer.. however not only did I find this rude, as she dismissed my employees knowledge but she essentially gender sniped me. She even actually said "You look like the nerdy type, you should be the one talking to people about this" I was honestly kind've breathtaken, considering I actually don't know about XBOXs. I'm a PC gamer, always have been! I owned a PS4 once. that was it. I immediately explained to the woman that I didn't know anything about XBOX as I played computer games, and she said "Oh that doesn't matter, you're still smarter on the subject than some" again, this was just.. wow. The cashier tried explaining she actually owned the Xbox 1 and the woman straight up said "I didn't ask for your input i asked for his, he knows what I'm talking about." It was.. quite the opposite. I didn't knowing anything other than what I was trained to say on the XBOX 1 promotion, this cashier girl knew everything considering she owned one. Needless to say I told the customer I was sorry, and that if she couldn't listen to the cashier then no one here could help her better. She was fairly angry and left. Whoops. Cin Tbh calling people fags is just a joke and if you can't handle that, well that's pretty weak. And generally men just don't cry as much. Women, by nature, are more emotional. They get offended more easily, they're more envious and petty and overreact way more than men. Which naturally leads them to be more prone to crying over things way more often than men. Ever seen a dude cry over literally everything? No because it's weird and unnecessary. Not to say men aren't allowed to cry because all humans cry, naturally anyone with common sense would acknowledge this. But you seem to think people actually believe men can't cry, how logical. If need be and a man happens to find himself in an awfully tragic situation, then he'll cry. Like if he loses a relative. A true man can feel manly but still acknowledge his emotions and cry every so often. Crying all the time and overreacting about everything is a really sissy thing to do tho, and such behaviour should not be encouraged. I u c k y I've read a lot of your comments across different videos and I don't usually read comments.Let's first just straighten this about feminists. If you live in places like America, the UK or Australia, you are, by default, going to be a feminist. I know you're emotional over it, but I don't actually think you're against equality. Next. I have never seen nor heard nor would subscribe to this 'feminist movement' that gets your goat so terribly. I also don't subscribe to UFO conspiracy movements either. Those people are obnoxious, weird and a margin minority compared to anyone else on this planet. The rest of us breathes a sigh of relief. We are in fact agreeing with you.When you want to rebut a comment about the 'pay gap' you might want to 1. Consider that they may in fact have an actual pay gap in their country.2. Check what they're actually talking about. Someone may simply be commenting on the fact that they checked out a census graph about working people and added up the part time and full time together to get to their conclusion. A political rant isn't really an appropriate response and neither is saying it's fantasy. It exists, and there's not much to do about it.There are legitimate reasons in life, living and psyche, that across the full census demographics in an equal pay society ends up with 'women' ultimately getting paid less than 'men', yes. Yes. YES-BUT:1. Can anybody fix it by complaining? No. Whinging? Eh, if it makes them feel better. They're not hurting anyone.2. Can anybody improve it by sticking up for themselves and considering their self worth a bit more? Sure, some cases. I'm guilty. I never walked into my manager's office directly asking for a pay rise. Sure that's evidence that I have an arrogant superiority complex over men right there. - -I remember my first job; I worked up this huge logical debate before I went in just asking for extra hours. Who knows how many people could actually get a pay rise in their position if only they had the balls to do it but 'eh, it's okay... I don't want to put strain on the finances. I could just go find another company who pays more outright instead if I really wanted'. (Notice I said 'people' there. My memory tells me you're going to miss it in favour of being emotional about the fact that there are bound to be some men in this pit as well.) In other cases, no. My mum asked for help in her job after it literally wrecked her arm and got yelled at by her manager for being too weak for the job. When she quit they replaced her with two men, not one. My mum was doing the work of two men with a damaged arm and it was her that was weak. Sure that's evidence that my mum has an arrogant superiority complex over men right there. - -3. Now, blanket stating because I didn't do the whole detail backtracking here, (care factor 2/10) but 'the rest of the cases' are basically lifestyle choices. It's well and sob arrogant for the rest of us (M+F) to look down at a census graph and go, 'hey, you're wrecking Australia's equality look! Go dump your two toddlers in highly expensive daycare and get a job to pay for someone else to raise your kids while they're still in their informative stage you worthless no good bum of a single mother.'As for women being selfish, well, I just told you a couple real stories where that's not a factor, so, do you mind and quit villianising a whole demographic because of some minority Ahole	Bum, Gay, Old, Weird	Age - Over 65s, Physical Identity - Physical (and Mental) Impairments, Sexual Identity - General, Sexual Identity - Male homosexuality, Social Class - Destitute	5/796	0.628

VAPX007 It is not a feminist thing to just think equality should be the norm. This was established decades ago. There are many people who believe an obtrusive hierarchy is annoying, I refuse to be lumped into the feminist category just because I believe what most normal people believe. To say that the only possible way for you to want everyone to just get along normally is to be a feminist, is absolutely ridiculous. And what actually defines a feminist, do explain, because the meaning seems to vary these days. A feminist could be someone who wants female supremacy, a feminist could be someone who's pro choice, a feminist could be someone who wants women to be treated like men, it goes on.Quite frankly, when I mention how nonexistent the pay gap is I am, most obviously, referring to the West. And since I'm writing in English and getting replied to in English, you would assume the people I'm talking with are Western folk as well. It's common sense really...although there may be the odd bunch that are foreign. Feminism is mostly a problem in the West, it's not so extravagant in other countries...so wouldn't you assume that I'm referring to the West? Come on now I know you're not that dense.And look sorry about your mum, but her being weak isn't really an attack on her for being a woman . Have you considered that maybe her boss thought she was weak as a person and not just as a woman ? Or maybe he just didn't like her? Don't you think it's a bit sexist to assume she was labelled weak due to her gender , and gender alone? And regarding my sexuality? Although I find it awfully strange of you to mention it, I am indeed straight. I don't see how I could reconsider liking women in that way tho, I thought people were born gay ? I think I might know the reason why people basically suppress a woman's/girl's interest in video games, they don't want the next generation to become a generation of video game playing slackers. I think the most post apocalyptic scenario for these people is a man laying on the couch with his wife laying on top of him with both of them holding controllers playing video games together inside of a house that hasn't been cleaned in weeks because they're both addicted to the playstation, and these two have two 8-10 year old kids who are also playing with them. And what do you mean "masculine spirited"??? She behaving in a professional manner and offered help to the customers. Gender doesn't come into these actions. It sounds like the first woman was pissed off that you couldn't understand her son. It probably had nothing really to do with you being a woman . Christmas shopping can be stressful at the best of times, it gets 100 times worse when you have kids. With the second incident with the elderly couple, you have to remember that this lady comes from a different time altogether. I don't think sexism is institutionalized (I.E. no laws support it a others ban it) I've actually been told by a boss he preferred hiring girls over boys because girls asked more questions (Guess this is still sexist) But yeah women have always been the ones to be legit sexist. There you have it. Hear ye, ye feminazis(soyboys and wamen alike) out there: women can be sexist too, even towards other women; in this case even more than men, which was funnyXD, because it is a sad fact, that too many normal men get unjustly branded for allegedly being sexist/etc., which they are clearly not, and that this example kinda proved that point.PS. before someone accuses me of allegedly being a sexist, misogynist, nazi , etc.; ...i am not. A terrible thing i would've done in your second shoes would be to ask the husband his opinion because he would (obviously) know better. ;) my typical sexist gamer story: It starts around a pre-order of Soul Calibur 5. Me and my brother head into our local GameStop, I want to preorder SCV, and my brother just wants to know what the upcoming games are. So I walk up to the registers(because it was dead silent), and my brother follows because the list for the new games is there. a clerk makes his way over to the registers and goes through the store shpeal. I guess we startled him, and he didn't realize anyone was in the store. So i just tell him I'm interested in pre-ordering the new soul caliber game on xbox 360. and the clerk turns his head to my brother and goes "Yeah the game is really great. I love the graphics and combo styles for the new characters." and my brother just smiles and nods, and I add "I hope they still have my favorites like Talim,Tika and Mitsu" the clerk glaces over and goes "they're in it." and starts asking my brother his favorite character. He looks over to me and goes "who's the one with the rapier?" and the clerk butts in and goes "Oh! Raphael! He's pretty nice." and my brother just look at the clerk and goes "I dont really play the game much, my sister loves it though." and the clerk turns red like a beet and rings up my preorder and we both walk out. There are a few flaws but maybe I'm wrong. I worked for them for many years, I'm surprised you were allowed to lurk in the background, It's area manager and store managers responsibility to ensure you pester customers as soon as they walk through the door. You even have to answer the phone with some garbage about pre ordering some games before saying "can I help you". As for the lady and her son, She was probably annoyed that you couldn't understand her son. Saying lets talk to one of the men could easily be the easiest way of saying "anyone else in this store" as you were probably the only female. The old guys wife probably doesn't like her husband talking to young ladies. I worked there for five years, my manager and assistant manager were female, my now wife worked with me there. She saw no sign of what your talking about. Christmas shopping customers were the worst, they are stressed with crowds, don't have any patience and will always try to be insulting. Like you say, the staff are fantastic, it was like a small family. Working in a shop would be great if it wasn't for customers. So a question... Well actually a statement then a question: Had I seen something like this happen in a store (particularly the second one) I would have felt compelled to step in and point out a number of factoids to subvert that old lady's incorrect beliefs: Two of my favourite game stores (retro games stores no less) are mostly staffed by women, one of them owned by a lady, and the senior sales person at the other is actually also a qualified auto-electrician, Oh by the way the editor of Outside Xbox magazine is a woman etc etc, that kind of thing. then I would point out that if this young lady was seen fit to be employed as floor staff by game, and not just relegated to the largely automaton cashier position (especially at Christmas) then I'm sure she is well capable of answering your question. End of statement. That being the case, would my intervention be appreciated or cause further upset? I know if ask ten people (or the entire internet as in this case) I'm going to get ten different answers but it would be interesting to know. Also the lady with the young boy: This annoys the crap out of me... I'm trying my best to take a real hard look at any of my own incorrect attitudes and make sure I'm being fair to everyone I meet, largely because I have two daughters and I don't want them to grow up with anything but confidence that they can succeed in any endeavour they should try. And here is a lady ensuring that her son probably won't give my daughters the respect they deserve simply because they are women, or will be women....you know what mean. Grr! intervention would probably have caused the elderly women to enforce her position, people don't like being wrong and will often, even if doing so is unreasonable defend their position when they feel attacked. a less aggressive method might be more effective when trying to persuade someone that their beliefs are incorrect. but generally...its better not to kick the beehive..I don't think a single claim from a mother to a 6-7 year old boy is going to have much impact on that boys perspective on women, and even if the mother doesn't think women are that qualified for this job and consistently echo's this at home, this doesn't mean that the boy will copy his parents beliefs (provided the child isn't isolated from the outside world, he is much more likely to copy the perspective of his friends and classmates...at that age ..its likely something like "girls are eww"...a kids bias that changes as they move into adolescence, and for him..a 20 y.o. female shop assistant is "an old women" ). your kids are not carbon copies of you..they will form their own beliefs as they grow up...setting a good example is great, but they will not copy all your merits, biases and vices. The truth is sexism would disappear way faster if not for some old ladies who are stuck in the sexist times and can't change their way of thinking. They might have been victims of sexism , but the truth is they are the biggest offenders right now, because they should be allies against sexism , yet they teach their sons and maybe even impressionable husbands that women can't know that or that and coming from a woman herself, the point can seem true to their family... at least I think so. No relative of mine is sexist, even coming from a traditional country house, the women are pretty much leaders in their houses (which can also backfire, but not as much as sexism since men do what they want anyway). The only exceptions are kind of sexist religious traditions. Anyway the sexism coming from women pisses me off way more than when males are sexist because it really comes out of nowhere and you can't blame it on misunderstanding or ego, but on pure high concentrated ignorance. I worked at game for 6 weeks this was last year for work experience at college. I was in on friday's for the whole day. I didn't get a shirt or anything because I was one of 3 (only one was there a day) . The only thing I had was a trainee badge. I get it people are hesitant as you are a trainee but when I went to help a woman who was walking around for like 10 minutes. She wanted to know about 3 games (I can't remember what they are). One of the games was Forza 7 and since she was stood in the playstation side I asked what console she had. When she saw I had a trainee badge she rudely said "Obviously playstation 4 why do think I am at the playstation games. What should I expect you're a trainee so you know nothing about games." I politely explained that Forza 7 is for xbox only. All i got from her was a response that I'm a trainee and I know nothing. I don't often like talking about myself much especially in work as its unprofessional in this case I thought it might diffuse this situation. I told her that i'm here on work experience from my course in game design so I know about game. I tried explaining once more about the games she interrupted me almost instantly saying shut the fuck up you know jack shit about any games now get me a proper employee. Since this was the day of CoD WW2 there was another person on the shop floor and he saw I was uncomfortable and he let me know to tell her another person would help her after he checked something. I told her that another person will help her in a minute. I went to help those behind me as they was wanting help. Not 1 second after turning around all I heard was her screaming (keep in mind this store was busy as all hell) how dare you turn your fucking back on me you are helping me who the fuck do you think you are you total and utter asshole. She kept saying things along that line for about 15 seconds while this was going on her body language was getting more aggressive. I was scared while this was going on. This ended with her being kicked out. After this I helped the other person out and went into the back and a 16 year old me who never have experienced customers like that before was on the verge of a panic attack as in the past I had experience with abuse and that gave me flashbacks to it.	Nothing, Old, Woman	Age - Over 65s, Age - Youngsters, Gender - General	4/453	0.883

It seems that nowadays more issues of sexism are either woman-to-woman or woman -created, than man-to- woman . There are asshole guys and fuck em, but why are there women doing same things? One day at work I encountered two girls that, while waiting in line, but basically next to me, were grumbling and gossiping loudly at some girl from their class, presumably, that my ears wanted to curl inwards... I was blown away by the level of "ghetto" in their conversation. Also at one job I was dubbed the "rude guy" for asking a mother to make her kids stop playing and running around the tables with computers, power wires and near windows... meanwhile all fathers I encountered over the span of 3 years in such situations would be like "gotcha" and proceed to calm down their kids and explain why it's dangerous. Worst case was when I had to handle situations where one particular woman was very disrespectful to my co-worker, to the point she cried and ran away... and the moment I stepped near the counter to sort the shitstorm out the woman started acting all polite, smiling and like a sweet old lady from the movies and was like "oh how wonderful, this smart gentleman will help me perfectly"... why	Old, Sexism, Woman	Age - Over 65s, Gender - General	4/211	1.896
Hello Amyrightmeow!This was a recommended video for me so first time seeing one of your videos. Earned the subscribe!I found it interesting that the women portrayed in this video were older women who were likely unfamiliar with video games and the gaming community as a whole. It makes me wonder about sexism trends in England. Is gaming mostly viewed as "for boys" there? Are social barriers present for women doing things that are meant for boys? Are Tom boys (girl who likes things boys usually like to do) frowned upon over there? Is the female gaming community very small in England? I'd be very interested in hearing from you on this.The most English experiences I've had were my friends showing picture and meeting a dude in New York City who gave me 2 pounds saying my first tea is on him when I visit so I wouldn't exactly know. As for OP. I truly am sorry that your girlfriend and others alike have dealt with this. I find it absolutely disgusting! But this is not a generational thing. It may appear that specifically with technological things due to their misunderstandings via not keeping up with today's changes, but it spans all ages. "[Waiting] for them to die" as cold and dark as it comes off, is an understandable idea, however it is not the cure to these issues. Proper intellectual advancement along with assisted growth (making sure people understand that just because things may appear one way in their experience does not mean everything will reflect that i.e. if every person of x was mean to them, does not mean that every x will be mean to them, x = a particular trait). I can totally understand this I work in a pretty heavily male-dominated field. And I don't hold that against the guys who work there. it's just when people think of the Jolly Chef they usually always think male and loud. A good majority of the time nobody really takes me seriously. It's mostly because my age but also my sex. So when they want advice about anything they always go to my male co-workers. Even though I went to the French Culinary Institute ICC and specialize in French cuisine, pastry and farm-to-table. But when somebody sees a chubby girl who's a chef they automatically assume she only makes cupcakes. That is literally only a small portion of my job. So one time I was working at this restaurant and some person ask to see the chef because the food was amazing. So they called me out and I worry. But the say it is was someone complimenting me. After that I was pretty flattered that they wanted to compliment me. I was still a student at the time so this really lifted my spirits. That was until I actually got to the table. The older woman states "no, I didn't mean for my dessert I meant for my food." And that is when I said "I made both actually." She was flabbergasted at this. She says to me "I suppose the abundance of whipped cream on my dessert makes sense now. It's okay dear. Us girls love our dessert. I'm sure your children will enjoy that" She made me feel so uncomfortable. this wasn't the first time something like this happened it was usually older women. one of them even accused me of flirting with her husband because I put an extra strawberry on his dessert. I remember going into Hollywood Video about a decade ago (back when it...y'know... still existed, it and Blockbuster), and while I was there, this woman with her young son (he must have been all of eight years old) walked in with a video game she'd rented for him, placed it on the counter, and sniffed at the poor kid working behind the counter with every square inch of her face suffused with a maelstrom of withering scorn in her judgemental fury. "This game is COMPLETELY unacceptable...!"I glanced over to see what she was talking about, and "YOU GOT GRAND THEFT AUTO FOR HIM?"I couldn't help it. It just burst right out of me. It said right on the case: "Grand Theft Auto." Which is rated M for mature. And as such, Hollywood had a policy of not renting out such games to minors without adult supervision (much like their policy regarding R rated films). Meaning that the kid handed her the game and said, "I want this!" Mommy proceeded to get him this. Whoever was behind the counter when Mommy got him this probably explained that the game is rated M for mature, and she probably scoffed and rolled her eyes and handed him her credit card. And then later she went home and was shocked to discover that a game titled "Grand Theft Auto" involves property theft and violence.The funny thing is, she was in fact shamed by that. Once I blurted out my reaction, it was obvious that she wasn't going to get away with subjecting a minimum wage employee to a scathing storm of criticism over his... working for a store that she had rented a mature game from, in spite of how insistent she was that this was someone's fault other than her own. A really important story to share. I worked at a Fish and Chip restaurant to pay off my student overdraft (I love being a student, I promise :) and routinely female customers would get quite aggressive and overly rude with female waitresses. If a male colleague came and explained the exact thing which the female waitress had explained, they would be content most of the time. If they weren't content, they would come to the kitchen (where I worked, hooray) and would demand an explanation. Our explanation would always clarify the problem and the issue was instantly resolved. I don't think my authority on the subject was questioned once, for any reason. And then for one month, one of the kitchen staff was female. And that poor girl got roasted by female customers for absolutely no reason, and we had to explain that she was correct multiple times to other women. It really opened my eyes to the fact that sexism towards either gender can be directed at anyone, by anyone. Absolute clusterfuck. Before that I hadn't really encountered it myself either.	Gender, Sexism	Gender - General	2/182	1.099
so... sexism in video games doesn't come from gamers? that's interesting ! and more importantly it comes from the people who are the less likely to have any interest in it, sour mom/grandmaI'll talk to my girlfriend about this, she's teaching me lots of stuff about video games everyday even though I'm quite a gamer myself I think this comes from those person knowing nothing and kind of relate to you so they assume you know nothing either, or that may come from a lack of confidence I've had the same scenario when I worked in a clothe shop, I was a beginner and so I hesitated much longer than my experienced female colleagues and so they point blank said to me that they'd rather ask the women, they might know better about fabric and style (I've been hired because I carefully chose how I dress in term of color cut and fabric) my colleagues have been nice enough to tell them that I know just as much and my hesitation comes from my lack of experience in the job allowing me to improve and in the end become a lot better at my job	Nothing, Sexism	Age - Youngsters, Gender - General	3/197	1.523

I see this all the time at grocery stores. Women totally disrespect other women. Men and women have a sex interest with each other and the power disparity also gives way to chivalrous behavior. But women have no incentive to be nice to women. You are just a nameless stranger to women out in the world so they have no reason to gain your trust. Some women do opt to befriend other ladies, even female employees, but some women just stomp all over other women. Despite modern day feminists complaining about the patriarchy, the ancient fairytale stories had it right. The antagonist to the princess is usually a evil woman. Most men want women to like them, cuz sex. But women will downright hate a girl, especially if she's pretty. Also women hate sexist remarks and they know it really hurts. I think people need to remember that the most awful thing about sexism is that it occurs all over the place. The culture of sexism isn't just one of aggressive wankers but of culturally reinforced prejudice. When I was around 14 I was prejudice against pretty much everyone who wasn't me... And I didn't think I was an asshole. So yeah I probably still have some unchecked prejudice I'm not aware of because it seems like every year I am aware of something new that I could have done better. When I'm complaining about sexism in the gamer community it's because I'm a gamer not because I'm anti-gamer. It's the experience I've had that I'm upset by. It has been getting better this year because the gamergirl and antifeminist "jokes" are finally a dead meme... But even then there is much room for improvement. Again though I have a great group of gamer friends now and I don't see them as sexist. I have lost at least one friend to the cult of 'anti-sjw'... +Rose Juliette There's no 'sexist culture' in the gaming industry. It's just that more dudes just so happened to play more games when the older generation was growing up and so some people in the older generation think it's strange to see women play video games. Most people in the younger generations KNOW that girls play games just as much as men. There's nothing wrong with that type of progression. The reason I dislike the SJW community is because they think that change can't happen at a slow and steady pace. 50 - 100 years is a good and steady pace for change in my opinion. After legalizing gay marriage in the US, progressivism has no place in modern society anymore because we've literally solved all political oppression. Now all we have to do is wait for the older generation to die out and the newer generations to take a hold of society. Why even try to push a useless, made up agenda that won't do anything but hinder the very things we've already accomplished? You can manipulate and change laws because of action but you can NEVER change the opinions of society itself without the progression of time. Nojatha because sexism exists in the game industry (obviously) we haven't solved all political oppression (obviously) and how do you think that change happens? +Rose Juliette Idk anything about what goes on in your steam inbox but one thing I can say for sure is that activism is NOT a necessary part of social change. You still don't seem to get it. social change happens over the course many years NATURALLY after activists change the law. Let's talk about how black people finally got equal rights. Did racist people suddenly go 'oh, I guess they're not bad people after all'? NO! They made the KKK! But guess what? The KKK aren't as present as they use to be since then. Why? Because the generation after the civil rights movement grew up in a society that SOMEWHAT accepted black people and then the generation after that generation grew up in a society that got a lot CLOSER to accepting black people and now generation z is growing up in a society that MOSTLY accepts black people. This is natural progression. I believe in activists changing the law, not changing social opinion. And yes, politically, everybody is equal. We had a black president to prove that. Everybody under the law is politically available to work at any job they apply for, live in any neighborhood they want, and do anything they want to do as long as it's within the boundaries of the law. AP P I mean i will say that you are onto something with the bad apples thing but I resent being told what I want. I don't care about quantity. I'm not a cultist. I don't care about how many members we have. I'm not even an activist. Never been to a rally. There are 'feminists' who hate the fact that I exist as a woman and if it were up to me I would kick them out. But I don't decide who calls themselves a 'feminist'. But I call myself a feminist because my work in mental health and recovery is inherently linked with both women's rights and mens rights. Some antifeminist people don't like that I call myself a feminist and some feminist people don't like that I call myself a feminist. Tome being a feminist is about working towards an end towards gender discrimination. That means I work towards and end towards trans discrimination, non-binary discrimination, male discrimination and female discrimination as well as all the places where they intersect. I do this through my role in my work. So yeah I don't care if some internet trolls think I'm a 'feminazi' but it does frustrate me that people think feminism is a homogeneous ideology... If people were genuinely interested in understanding feminism, they would see that feminism has a diverse range of philosophy and politics, just as you mentioned. Like feminists disagreeing with feminists is so common , but some people would take that as feminism is hypocritical, therefore invalid. Or they don't see such things happening because they narrowly view feminism as a singular entity, therefore a hive mind.I mean the fact that trans-exclusionary radical feminists exist, and are often reviled by liberal feminists, or how some feminists distinguish black/Latina feminism from (mainstream) white feminism, often because of it's neglect to address discriminatory racial issues in the movement, should be a good indicator that it's more complicated than what people in bad faith perceive it to be.	Common	Social Class - Working class	1/124	0.806
Brian C I know that 1st and 2nd wave feminism was needed in a way and I have overheard older women of those time stating how this generation of women are an embarrassment to feminism as they are acting like self entitled brats. Also that the main thing that should really be addressed is hypergamy and gynocentrism as if this group really is in support of helping everyone yet they treated women who made documentaries like the RED PILL and other sources from studying on toxic femininity and toxic feminism as it seems they are not really for inclusive as they claim. It's even wrong for people to enforce on others as the use of totalitarianism to enforce onto others.	Red	Ideological and Political Identity - General, Ethnicity - Native-American	2/120	1.667
Brian C if it was REALLY about including different opinions and differences of thought yet majority has pushed away out of demonizing anyone that doesn't follow their ideology even if it's of people from different parties like liberals and conservatives but even a new group calling themselves Classical liberalism are separating themselves of how radicalized their previous group has become that even left leaning animators from family guy, simpsons, south park etc mocked them.but you also forget that feminism censored anything that they deem offensive for the sake of being offended instead of dealing with real world problems as if fiction lives matter to them that it even hurts women who can't be able to have creative freedom out of being prevented to create anything thus it creates a whole new term of sexism as a Japanese woman representative had to defend their countries freedom of creation from being prevented to create our of fake hysteria that has no evidence to it being detrimental as violent video games has proven to not be detrimental as it doesn't enforce bad things on others. I'm not saying that men don't do it, but statistically, speaking Women are more sexist to women than men are to women. But why is that? Well, it's simple really. If a man is sexist to women odds are he's not going to get a mate, but a woman being sexist to other women is beneficial as you can make another woman seem worse than she really is to a man and odds are that woman may not get the man you want leaving that man open for you to take. Yes, I'm leaving out homosexuality due to the simple fact that it's not as common as heterosexuality, but I am not saying homosexuality is a bad thing. In terms of homosexuality on the topic of sexism is a whole other story which is more complex than this. I have pondered about sexism and Homosexuality and trust me it gets complex. When I say Statically I'm also meaning on Average as well. Of course, there will be men who are sexist. Just like how there will be some women who are stronger than men or some men who are weaker than women. It's an on average type of thing and there are going to be varying results. Women didn't have to "riot" to vote. ALSO, women in the past didn't want to vote. WHY? b/c voting equaled being drafted into a war if needed and if you don't think that voting and being drafted are connected then just look at the 26th amendment of the USA constitution on March 10, 1971. The entire reason for that amendment was so that draftable aged men (18) could vote. Due to the fact that Voting equaled being drafted meant that women didn't want to vote. I'm not saying women shouldn't vote. I think they should be able to. Whether you want to believe it or not boys were sold off to old women and men to be child husbands just like girls were sold off to old women and men to be child wives. That wasn't a gendered issue back then it was a child issue with Pedophilia. Men in porn objectified just as much as women are. I won't say that the past doesn't affect the present as it does, in fact, affect the present, but there are things in the past that we have done to correct ourselves on. Let's say there is a score balance system of things we've done wrong in the past and that was at a score of -1 and then we fixed our mistake and put it at a 0. Tell me why we need to push forward more stuff to correct things we've already corrected like the Equal Pay Act of 1963 (looking at an economic point of view and knowing that women are just as capable as men to do a job I think if I was able to pay women less I would hire women over men and by doing so making it where women are paid more than men overall).Don't be putting this on me YOU DON'T KNOW ME AND YOU CERTAINLY DO NOT KNOW WHAT I HAVE BEEN THROUGH! +Fragmentofanusha When I was in Highschool the only thing most guys were good at was sports. All of my advanced classes I was in which was everything, but English, were filled with girls with like 2 other guys in the same class. The guys at my school were stupid. B/c I pretty much only had Female classmates I listened to their gossip and they said that girls are more mean to other girls so I'm pretty much taking it from their experiences. I realize women can do just as much stuff as men. Although maybe women can't do heavy lifting stuff, there are a few women out there who can and I have met some physically strong women and well I'm a Bone skinny guy so you know that those women can beat me up without a sweat. Perhaps I am wrong or I might be right idk as it really doesn't matter which gender is more misogynistic and all that does matter is that Men and Women are equal with a few minor differences that makes one gender better than the other in very specific situations that don't actually come up as often that most people think. I was expecting to watch this video and hear how the evil misogynistic men were puttin' the whamens down again.I am so glad I was mistaken. Yes there are dude bros out there that think women know nothing about games, but there are women out there who aren't gamers that project their lack of knowledge onto another person of the same gender , which is indeed sexist.	Gender, Nothing	Age - Youngsters, Gender - General	2/67	2.985
Do you realise that feminism and gender equality is not really about evil men but about a patriarchy that benefits men and hurts women. In this society there are men AND woman who are affected by these ideas. It is never really an issue who is sexist, men or woman , it's who the sexism is against. LJK401 - I clicked on this video half expecting the same things. I figured I'd hear the usual talk about misogyny and a bunch of other buzz words. It gets a little tiring when you see so many on social media do it blatantly for the views/likes. You have to admit, identity politics gets out of hand at times and it's promoting a lot of victim mentality to the point where people are almost on the lookout for even the slightest sign of sexism or racism just so they can call it out on social media for likes/views. But when I heard this video in it's entirety it was her explaining her experience in detail and she wasn't preachy about it; She wasn't making any demands; Nor was she generalizing any groups of people based on gender . She was frustrated and understandably so. I'm a woman and if I were in her shoes it would frustrate the living hell out of me too. (they probably left cause they saw you trying to help but she was a being stupid.) as for the old lady, no. it doesn't matter if your a guy at a gamestore. anyone can tell what's new in videogame's it's easy so there's no need to ask a "professional" or a guy about what game is best. anyone can take a guess and have 50/50 that the people who will play it will like the game in the end. 5:50 and 9:04 It is not sexism . It is logical. Most women don't play men's games. Most "female gamers" are on the mobile market, if you eliminate it, you are left with a weak 20, not even... and if you only take FPS, survival, strategy and such... females? What is that?... So when a mother tries to get a toy to her boy, seeing you she will make a proper risk/probability assumption. She has a little boy and fucking the gift up could be a monumental bummer. As such she needs to find someone who is at least likely to know about games and to know about games that interest males (it is not cultural, it is biological). As such, not knowing you are a tomboy , she goes looking for the one she thinks is better suited to give advices.Also one very important thing: Females do that to you because they were at your point once in life. They know better than anyone how to get a job and advantages because of their pussies and know even better why they would not employ themself... As every fucking day, I have to put to the trash and rework entire codes of my female workers who are here only because of affirmative actions. They can't code for shit, create not wealth but troubles and TROUBLES only, and I have to pretend to do my work while I also do THEYR fucking work without telling anyone. The boss knows about it, I get wealth, under the fucking table... because if I leave the entire thing will crumble to pieces as many of our competitors... but I don't know how much I can handle, I don't know how long will Europe last until we take back the vote for women and educate them as to be loving brides instead of the ugl's, gold digging monster we let them become.There are competent women. Rarer than the already rare enough competent men... but here we are killing the competents in favore of parasites. I will and do honor women who deserve it, not more not tess than they need to be, compared to their male counterparts, on an individual basis. but know woman ... that this is not sexism you experiance. It is people who don't know you and as such take the best, probability wise better solution. They assumed you were here because of your vagina, because of affirmative tyranny. ugh honestly women have at least as much capacity to be sexist as guys do and this concept that they dont honestly pisses me off. im a woman majoring in game design and development and despite the fact that there are far more men than women in my major, i have yet to see any one of the men be remotely sexist, while a woman i know in that major avoids working in the main labs like the plague because she apparently cant stand how the guys in there behave - meanwhile i'm in the labs on a near daily basis because i find it an enjoyable place to work - not to mention things like networking and people just casually chatting about really useful things to know . one time she found me in the lab just as she was leaving and she whispers to me "oh my god i just cant stand them anymore right aren't they so fucking obnoxious" and i actually had no clue as to what she was taking about. i have yet to hear a story from her that sounds like anything more than generic "haha im a better programmer than you because i know this one tiny thing that you dont" or "haha im a better programmer because i use language x instead of language y". while this mindset is held almost as exclusively by men in the field, it is equally directed towards men and women. not liking to work in a loud environment is one thing, but avoiding it because its mostly guys is another thing, and it's an attitude that will frankly disable her entire career if she keeps it. Yep women are nasty, batshit crazy , bad tempered, jealous banshees. Women have a tendency to make themselves unhappy in their lives because they do what is expected of them and not what they really want. Then they spend their time taking it out on other women who's own happiness irritates them. I work on computers and spend my time gaming and messing around with anything tech and have experienced this attitude myself. I took one of those silly surveys once that my friend send me. I've only ever had a sexist moment once while working in retail, (in an awesome place that rhymes with Tar-gos) when I was chatting to a dad and his kid because he was looking for age appropriate games for his 8 year old but also some cool games for himself that were OK for family, and his wife/girlfriend/whatever rolled her eyes at my suggestions and kept tutting and looking on her phone. It wasn't until later after I'd talked to the guy for a bit, suggested Crash N Sane trilogy and the uncharted games that his partner let out a huge sigh and told him "We should just see one of the lads they'll sort us out."I was all ".whut? Cause I dont got no penis doesn't mean I don't know games, lady." But obvs, being in retail, you just scrunch your face up and smile through it.I think I won though, the dude bought Crash n Sane trilogy and Uncharted 4 and the dlc game lol Best thing that ever happened to me though was this kid who was really sad because he'd just found out (after spending 20 minutes looking) that Cuphead ISN'T a disc, but download only game (Feckin shame at that, it should totally be disc.) His second and third choice games were out of stock, or simply didn't exist on disc and were download only. He was only like.. 11 but he started to cry a bit because his dad owned his xbox and he was away working out of the country, so he couldn't buy games on the online store until he got home. The kid was there with his nan, who looked absolutely clueless about games and kept suggesting he buy toys that were not in his age range (bless her) and on top of all of this, it was the kid's birthday! So he wasn't getting a present that day. I asked them to wait a few minutes while I clocked out of my shift and then caught up with them after and told the lady to take her kid to a certain shop in a certain town, because although they dont have the games the kid wanted, they DID have merch of Cuphead, bendy, fnaf games etc which I think would've made the kid super happy. I feel like it was more an issue about you not having a shirt, so many may not think you actually work there, in my years of knowing and remembering me going to game, which is a shop i go to almost every time I'm in town, I've never overheard issues like that, not saying the issues don't exist, but they're extremely rare, especially over sexism . The reason I think it's that you're not wearing a shirt that has the logo on it is because they don't think you work there, they may never have seen a salesperson without an official GAME t-shirt on , when they say "guys" , they may just be referring to the people with shirts on, and have abridged it to "guys" . This isn't a defence, it's a reasoning. Personally, I never deal with the salesperson, the conversation normally goes;Me browsing Xbox one gamesGAME employee: "hi, you looking for anything?"Me:"no thx, just browsing"Employee:"Anything in particular?"Me:"No, thank you"Or , if I'll ask if they sell certain things, I was advised by a game employee when I asked whether they sold 1TB hard drives (ext) for xbl to not buy it and instead they gave me websites that stock 2tb hard drives , I'll ask for a personal opinion on games, and often I get into discussions, whereas gamestop tries pestering people in store to buy games, GAME is the complete opposite, they're quite laid back , and it's not just my seaside town one , i've gone to the one in London and Norwich, and it was the exact service there	Sexism	Gender - General	1/272	0.368

there's a pros and cons but I would respectfully disagree and tell right on your face that is not the case! You'll see asshole backstabbing women 50-100 times more than a murderous rapist men (that you would even encounter once in a fucking lifetime if not never). Also because of blatant brainwashing medias, sexist and racist men are almost completely nonexistent only if they were just being sarcastic. I know a lot of men are just avoiding women now entirely. Why would we need to suffer for this 0.0001 chance of happening excuses or reason? Where we are surrounded by toxic, narcissistic, and entitled women left and right? Why would we need to suffer by you assholes that are just angry for us existing? It's like what this video shows, women are the worst enemy of other women. You hate each other because of your insecurities and jealousy. Why would us need to suffer for that? Why would us men need to blame for what you are completely lacking and need to work on yourselves. We men worked our issues with only ourselves! Why would you need someone's approval like the medias and other beta simps to solve your issues. No wonder you women became spoiled like this. If there's a question about who's the most coward and selfish people on Earth, I would never answer that specifically. Because I met a lot of women hundred times worse than the men I hate, it's almost like if their gender bend their crimes would be worse than death. JAMES LUNE My parents are doing thier jobs right. My siblings and I know our morals in life. Violent games are nothing more to us than a few hours of multiplayer fun. Call of Duty, Halo and Tekken are some favorites. And before you say my parents are still "bad", there's a reason the non gamer parents put the heavy gaming teenage older brother to determine what games are good for the younger kids. The very reason my 11 year old brother is allowed to play Call of Duty and Tomb Raider, but I still have yet to get him GTA5 despite his constant asking. I KNEW emulation was illegal, but that cop either didn't know, or didn't give a shit. Seeing that he was experienced, I'm going to guess he didn't give a shit. Also, tell me, when you think of annoying CoD players, do you think of the 30 year old getting home from work and too tired to even look remotely good at the game, or the 12 year olds skipping school and screaming that they banged our mom while doing a 360 no scope headshot for an instant kill and they'll have their uncle ban your account? I really don't see the problem in letting younger children play shooting games, so long as they're taught morals and the importance of human lives and the differences of games and real life. Also being watched and monitored (because you obviously wont let them see something like nudity or whatever). I mean, I'm a girl and 14 but I've never liked barbies or dress up and stuff. Still don't. I love to play COD and other shooting games with my older nephew and older brother. When I was very young my parents started teaching me the importance of gun safety and how to properly handle a gun and disarm a dangerous situation in case of attacks or anything. I was taught that guns are not toys and can take lives. I went to the shooting range at a young age and still do. I'm the youngest in my family but am the best shooter and know gun safety better than all my siblings. I'm a girl, but that doesn't mean I HAVE to like make up and dolls. I love video games and target shooting. I won't let anyone take that from me.	Age	Age - General	1/193	0.518
What reason do I have to lie. I gain nothing from saying this except in letting others understand that letting kids play certain 'violent games' is ok, when they are taught properly, have adult supervision, and have their parents approval. And if their parents approve, there really isn't much else you can do except try to change their mind. I don't buy games like that directly because it is technically illegal, so I ask my older brother, who is 19, to do it for me. He or my parents have no objections to letting me play violent games, except for GTA and stuff like that because of the nudity and such. I do not approve of games like those until at least 17 years of age .	Age, Nothing	Age - General, Age - Youngsters	2/126	1.587
just some person Wait a minute. So you think it's ok for a child to play a violent video game, but a pair of computer drawn tits is too much? Sorry, but this kind of inconsistency is why you don't get to make this decision. You're a child, you want to play these games because they're fun and cool, but the reason you're being told you can't is meant to be for your own good. You might even be ok, totally unaffected by it, you might be mature for your age , you might be able to easily draw a line between fictional violence and real life. Not everyone is the same though....you've said yourself, you think a little bit of nudity in a game is bad and only 17+ should be able to play it.....why? Because it might affect their views on women? Why, then, can you not see the obvious parallel with violence being inappropriate for children?Sage of Fire - When everyone but a 14 year old is calling bullshit on your argument, I wouldn't be too proud of that. When I first started reading this I thought it was a matter of her age not gender mainly because Call of duty is rated M meaning they are not legally allowed to sell it to any person under the age of 17 and that is a law in every 1st world country except the few that are even more strict and say 18	Age, Gender	Age - General, Gender - General	3/63	4.762
Simpleton Apollo No I think you are missing the point. firstly your right on part of this. There is a substantial amount of evidence from studies that prove games don't cause violence and none to support that it does cause it. how ever it is Illegal to sell any game rated M to any persons under the age of 17 in most countries and the few its not it's instead illegal to sell it to those under 18. So that's what people are saying. It's the same problem I have with the media saying that games like Call of duty cause violence in children and I mean beyond the mountain of evidence to prove they don't. Because Every game they claim causes child violence is a game Illegal to sell to children. A game for adults who are never in these big news stories because adults generally know better and aren't as impulsive. A problem with the child and the parenting not the game. It's like saying it's Illegal to sell a hand gun to any persons under the age of 21 in the USA. So the mom and dad chose to buy their 5 year old a hand gun for hunting in the woods behind their house. Then they act surprised and that they have no responsibility when their child does something dumb with it and say stuff like its the guns fault not mine for skirting the law. No one would fucking buy that so why do they do it with games. It's a matter of parents wanting to avoid responsibility with raising their children not the games. And while I do think what media you let your child consume is up to the parents discretion the age ratings are there for a reason. you can't show your child a rated R movie then claim it was the movies fault your child had a bad dream why do people think you can do it with games. First look at the game which is rated about 12 and the other thing is that it is not common for 9 year old girls to play COD. Still not common !!!! Even after more then 50 years feminism many girls are doing girly things !!!!So not everything is sexism but some people have to adapt that not every person is the same. Most girls are more likely to play to pokemon or something in this direction. There is also no reason to almost punch somebody because he or she makes a mistake. I would shamed them in a funny way and used sarcasm to make clear that not everybody is the same... I also would have made clear that she knows perfectly well what she wants and because of that we want a professional opinion to help her making the best choice.Then everything has been said but i like the outcome and that she won the free game so that not only made it clear that girls are able to play but also can be good. I am a gamer for over 30 years and i love when women are gaming or nerdy. But i do not like when women are lashing out and can not handle the backlash. I also do not like gender politics in videogames. Everybody should be free to play what her or she wants and i against bullying boys as girls online. StormFire52 I just think that those generalisations are unfounded and not routed in evidence. You say things like 'most feminists' but have you met most feminists? Have you read any large survey results of popular feminist opinion? If I was to give an example... One of the largest feminist organisations in the US is 'NOW'. They have existed since the 60s and have worked with so many people to petition for; gay rights, disabled rights, an end to systemic racism in employment, and what may be a surprise to you... 1) youtube is evidence in these cases mainly because theyre real people that are recording a real life situation, and when someone is recording off a phone its almost always a real life scenario because if it was staged youd want a good quality camera to capture HD footage and still be able to play it off as a vlog that was in the making. Not to mention you can pretty much always tell if theyre faking it or if theyre not just by studying their voice, the stuff they say, what theyre doing, and compare all that to others and theyd do in the same situation, or at least a very similar situation.2) yes men have their own emotions, but at the same time when you go up to a group of black males preaching about god and jesus and suddenly a feminist walks up and starts harrassing them and pushing their buttons as much as possible, its not their fault at that point. the feminist clearly went out of her way to try and ruin the groups social life in that instance. And to be frank, you may control your own actions but if someone is going out of their way to manipulate the situation into doing something you'd not ever dream of doing at any other time I wont be blaming the black guy for shoving the feminist, ill be blaming the feminist for instigating and antagonizing the group that were doing no harm, and manipulating the situation into getting the guy to lose his shit half an hour later of constant button pushing and reacting badly after losing control	Black	Ethnicity - Black	2/274	0.73

also although feminism is still valid on 2nd and 3rd world countries who dont really have many rights for women, when you're in places like the USA or Canada, you dont really have much to complain about, as far as I can tell with both canadian and american laws, women have just as much rights as men, maybe even more rights. And if you think that the same issue, which was addressed about 100 years ago now, is still an issue in a fully developed country who recognized and started fixing the issue a 100 years ago, then you need to go grab some common sense. This issue about feminism isnt an issue in many places around the world, it was recognized and addressed a very long time ago, in some places 100 years ago, others maybe even longer, And the issue has been actively being fixed ever since it was recognized. so to think that women still dont have any rights in fully developed places is just really stupid.If you're a feminist and say there are the 2nd and 3rd world countries where women dont have rights, well guess what? I doubt men would have much more rights than women in those places as generally speaking those countries have a distinct lack of human rights to begin with, so it aint just women who have these issues. Also, dont think Im anti feminist to all feminists, just the ones in america who seem to think that they've still got fuck all for rights, and blatantly blame men for everything and go out of their way to ruin the social lives of men. Its not necessary to go out of your way to try and ruin someones life simply because he is a male, and you end up doing more harm than good by going down the "lets ruin some social lives" path. when I pointed out Simpleton Apollo was right its what I noticed in american feminists who still think they have fuck all for rights just because they're women, because it is so far from the truth its not even funny, its just downright sad that they still think thats the case.EDIT: If there isnt equality among genders I support having equality, in simple terms I am a feminist if theyre actually about equality, not about hating the other gender . but I still think its a bit ridiculous to complain about not having rights in places like america and canada who have more human rights than most other countries in the world, and have actively been trying to fix the equality issue for at least a good century. Dubanx I'm sorry I didn't knew we had to go to the goverment offices and fill some paperwork to register as a feminist, I thought strongly believing in equality, voting laws that advocate for it, (in my case) going to protests for men unfairly separated from their kids because of the shitty divorce laws of my country falling on favor of the mothers (because favoritism it's not what equality it's about and i thought it was clear to a real feminist) supporting my male brother, as well as the protests for equal salary when doing exactly the same job and being equally qualified for it, not recognizing misandric crazy girls as feminist as well as not labeling all men as sex offenders and many others would count me as a valid one... my bad	Crazy, Sex	Gender - General, Physical Identity - Physical (and Mental) Impairments	2/135	1.481
Raff Hulot yeah except that... no kid, you got that wrong You can't say "you're not irish if you don't drink until your liver begs mercy" because that's obviously not related to your nationality or your cultural identity so it's bullshit ergo, fallacy.But you CAN say "you can't call yourself part of this movement if you don't follow the main and most crucial principles and actually go against them" I mean for example, you can't call yourself a neo nazi if you're not antisemitic and love and profess Judaism, you can't be a gamer if you have never played or haven't even been interested in videogames in any way, you can't call yourself a racist if you're not a bigot who absurdly discriminates just because of the race and a sense of entitlement, etcAnd you can't definitely call yourself a feminist by being a misandristic immature girl that just leaves the rest of us in shame while fighting for unimportant things like inclusive language or a stick figure with a skirt in the pedestrians traffic lights, those kind of girls don't represent what feminism stands for. You know why we don't take part or "OWN" any of the bullshit from a radical sector that obviously attracts more the attention from the media for doing ridiculous shit out of pure resentful hate towards all men, it goes viral to prove that 'we are wrong', they hurt the cause out of ignorance and longing for attention, and we don't "OWN" that shit because THEY DON'T REPRESENT US. MGTOW are just feminazis with a penis and misogyny instead of misandry btw.Yes, of course you see women defending those ridiculous hashtags and movements and just pulling a sort of 'it waz a prenk brou' out their arses... There is already a phrase for "actual feminist", it's "reasonable person". Believe it or not, being a bigot isn't the norm, they are a minority, the majority of people do fit the requirements of the most core ideas of feminism. A group is defined by the people who actually do the most, good or bad, in the name of that group. When you think of a Nazi , you don't think of the hundreds of thousands of people just trying to get by and following orders because of what the alternative is, you think of the one angry genocidal dwarf . I don't usually comment on videos but I connect with your experiences on a personal level. I worked at GAME from September '17 to June '18 - also initially as a Christmas temp. I received numerous sexist and rude comments from customers (predominantly male). Here are some of my best moments:1. Trying to find some games from one of the lower drawers behind the counter &amp; the gentleman I was serving says to my male colleague that he must 'love to see me on my knees'. I should add that he had his grandkids with him &amp; I can't imagine what wonderful habits they're picking up.2. Being asked by a customer what I usually play. A male colleague butting in saying that I mainly play JRPG. Then getting called a fake gamer and being told I shouldn't be working for a games store. 3. And much like your experiences mentioned in the video, the countless times I had both male and female customers saying they'd rather speak to a male employee because they would know more. One woman I had to deal with was borderline trying to make a complaint about me despite me and the manager saying the exact same thing to solve the issue she was having. My team were nice but the customers were a huge reason I didn't enjoy my time working for the company. Although the gaming industry is making moves in terms of less sexism directed towards women, it's sad to see that even a few years after your experiences, the same issues are still prevalent. I work at Homebase (soon to be "worked" since our store is one of the ones shutting down) so you know, tools, gardening equipment etc. Quite a few of my colleagues are women and have been there for much longer than I have and generally know what they're about when it comes to our stock. I, on the other hand, am just some guy who works behind the till. I have no interest in gardening, painting/decorating or DIY and only really know the location of items not how they're used or which tool fits which job. Yet time and again I've seen and heard customers pass over my more experienced female colleagues who are ready to help, to "ask one of the guys" (often me) to which I've had to respond with a weak smile and a "Sorry, I'm not sure about that. I've run across too many guys in stores where males are commonly considered expert who knew absolute jack about the hardware (as in screws and lumber) or software respectively. Similarly, the most expert people in the sewing shop up the street are not middle-aged women but cosplayers of various sexes. The time I visited such a shop with middle-aged women working there, several knew nothing about sewing. I can kinda relate to you in a way not the sexism because I'm a boy so people assume it's normal for me and hard emphasis on boy because I was at the time 15 and this was when I was doing work experience. You know that thing you do where you spend a week working. I decided to do it at game. But one day a family came in mother farther and their 8 heard old daughter I was walking around the shop floor and I asked (as you do) "Hello is their anything your looking for in particular if so I'm hear to help you" the mother say "oh hi my daughter is looking to get a new games console but the doesn't know which one she wants she keeps saying something about a came called FORTNITE that she wants to play" I respond back all British and polite by saying "yes I can help you with that fortnite is provided on 3 to 4 different consoles you have the Xbox one, PS4, Nintendo switch, and any apple device but it depends on what memory your looking fo..." her husband interrupted me and said "hey maybe we should ask one of the actual males who most likely actually play games and know about this stuff because I'm sure you don't know do you" I clenched my fists because I was annoyed about what he said the co-manager came over and said "I'll take it from here you go get me some spare headphones from the store room downstairs. I proceed to go downstairs and do as I was asked and when I got in their I shouted not to loud" SON OF A BITCH HOW DARE HE TREAT ME LIKE THAT JUST BECAUSE I'M NOT WEARING A BRANDED GAME SHIRT YOU THINK I'M A IDIOT" the manager was their and heard me and said "you should honestly take a break for the rest of today you don't seem to happy ill talk to the customer and you go home and relax."The next day the mother came back in again without her husband and said "i'm so so sorry for my husband being suck a douche he just wasn't in the mood that day, but can you still help me find that bundle for me" That guy did annoy me and I did let it go through my head and make me depressed but when she came Back and apologised I felt better I asked one of the female employees if this happens regularly and she just cut me off and said yep don't be surprised everyone gets it a lot even meIt's almost like game is a curse for workers both male female and teens	Apple, Old, Sexism	Age - Over 65s, Ethnicity - Native-American, Gender - General	3/459	0.654

I work in a bakery, and tbh I've had many more rude female customers than male. I've had women complain about the way I did my hair for work TO MY FLIPPING FACE, bitch about prices, bitch about the way I boxed things up for them, etc... I've had one male get very rude at me over mishearing him and then another one get rude over the time it took to give him 5 slices of cake (I had to slice the cake up). I have more rude customer stories about the female customers than I do the male ones. It's crazy ! My coworkers have been called stupid also right to their faces. I was quite surprised to be honest. Not sure why this video appeared in my recommended section and I cringed a little when I saw the title, but I was like "heck, let's laugh at another feminist that screams patriarchy again". Lo and behold, this girl not only has a pretty cute positive voice but she also didn't complain about non-sense. Even though this is quite minor in my opinion, those women were still kinda rude for assuming such a thing that only boys know about games and nerdy stuff. To be honest, those people were quite old , like the woman with her son was maybe 30 or more and the old lady was, well , a grandma. So of course they have that old mentality: only boys like video games, only women can cook and so on. Sorry you've been through that but hey, take it as an experience. You just assuming you know what I am thinking when clearly you do not know me and you are wrong. This is what I was talking about earlier: feminists that hate men and would do anything to belittle them and make them seem like the bad guys. I would've been the same if it was a man. I don't care about this whole gender war bullshit, there are men and there are women, we will never be equal because we were never meant to be equal, this is the nature's law. There is absolutely nothing you can do about it, just accept it and come together and accept each other with both flaws and qualities. I know there is still sexism out there, but feminists just took it too far and became extremists, wanting nothing more than to destroy men and what they have. SHF / ShadowHunterFi lol you think your opinions are fact. You like your own comments and you use terms like SJW and feminazi . Sure you aren't a douchebag. This idea that the SJW and PC culture (or whatever you want to call it) is just a pile of bs. People getting just as outraged as the people they claim the people they disagree with are.Find me some people who self identify as SJW or feminazis in a non ironic way and maybe you will have the beginning of a point... Even then though you are getting outraged at a handful of people because they got outraged at a different group of people.Now I'm commenting in a way that could be perceived as outraged (though I don't really care so don't expect any more replies) to a person who is outraged about a group of people who are outraged at a group of outraged people. It's the circle of bs my friend and the YouTube comments section is where it is cultivated. It draws us in with its stupidity until we respond to it as though it is real. It isn't. That's why you don't often meet these people in the real world. In fact I've met way more obnoxious 'anti-sjw' and 'anti- feminazi ' IRL than I have any other annoying group.Cultivated outrage as a marketable identity... People love buying into that shit.	Feminazi	Gender - Female intelligence	1/236	0.424

Honestly, your arguments make zero sense. SJWs and feminazis exist, it's not my opinion, it's a fact. The argument that they don't exist unless someone identifies as one is absolutely ridiculous. It's just clear that you are an SJW yourself. Your arguments don't make sense, and you try to avoid my arguments because you can't debunk them in a way that would even make sense. We don't need people like you on youtube.	Zero	Age - Youngsters	1/73	1.37
[LINK] [LINK] There are the definitions for both an SJW and a feminazi . You clearly fulfil the description of an SJW. I didn't call you and SJW because i didn't understand what you were saying, i called you an SJW because you act like one, and now i can confirm that you are one (without you even knowing it, that's just sad). Your arguments really don't make sense, and it's useless to say that i just don't understand it. Your arguments can't be applied to actual real world situations and they are extremely one sided.	Feminazi	Gender - Female intelligence	1/95	1.053

Azura Forestglen yes so narrow of me to point out that the fact that there is no evidence presented here self identified SJW or feminazis and it's just an insult thrown about at people so that they can justify their outrage. Yep so very narrow. It's not like this has been a reoccurring theme in resistance to change for like decades. "It's political correctness gone mad" they cried whilst making up stories of oppressive hippies in the 60s. Also urban dictionary is not a good source of public opinion. If you could provide me a source that shows that public opinion aligns with urban dictionary I will eat my hat. Urban dictionary was created to document dumb internet terms in a satire way... Plus did you even read the sources? I swear this is one of the most lackluster conversations I have had in a long time. It is really disappointing when the level of argument is just making shit up and saying the other person doesn't make sense. You create an enemy that has so broad a definition and is so undeniably unlikable that rather than actually engage with the conversation you just accuse the other person of being part of that group in the hopes that counts as a refutation. And by pointing this out 'clearly' I'm just an SJW too. I don't even have to say anything even related to social justice. I just have to challenge your narrative and I'll be framed as an SJW... Which was the point I made in my initial comment. Outrage at hypothetical SJW and Feminazis who hypothetically would be making irrational arguments and shouting at people. No actual reference to people who do this and identify as these people. Just a strawman cast in the general direction of those you would hypothetically disagree with. So yeah framing people as SJW and Feminazis is dumb and irrelevant to the video. It's just a way to pat yourself on the back for not having the opinions of hypothetical assholes who are angry at nothing... Only you are angry at nothing because those SJW and Feminazis aren't here. I don't know how many other ways I can explain this to you. Either you can show that there is reason to be outraged about real people and that it is relevant to this video... Or you can't and it is just more unnecessary outrage towards hypothetical people who you claim to be unnecessarily outraged. What'll it be?	Dumb, Nothing	Age - Youngsters, Physical Identity - Physical (and Mental) Impairments	4/415	0.964

SHF / ShadowHunterFi    okay clearly you have nothing of substance to add here. This is my final thoughts. If you are so sure of your opinion how come your own "sources" (and I use that term very loosely) disagree with you. Here are some quotes from the definitions you linked to. SJW"the term has continued to evolve. While the previous definition sometimes applies, it's now often used simply as an excuse to dismiss things other people say without having to think about them at all, regardless of whether or not they have a valid point. In other words, it's increasingly used as if it's a "get out of jail free" card for insulting entire groups of people. This watering down of the meaning is slowly turning the term into a meaningless insult."Feminazis"the idea of conflating a liberation movement with Nazism is just deeply ignorant. It's self-undermining, because it's so over the top"My dismissal of your source wasn't because it 'proved' me wrong. Both your sources reiterate things I have already said. I just think it's silly to use an urban dictionaryn definition as a proof of existence. Especially since it also defines SJW as a skeleton jazz wizard. I sent you a video that displays a concrete example of how SJW are imagined by people to generate marketable outrage. Since you have not already absorbed that I will recommend you give it a watch.I dunno maybe you are really young and inexperienced or something. Maybe you haven't developed a good understanding of how evidence based argumentation works. Maybe you are just headstrong and unwilling to reflect on your own opinion. It's certainly something that happens during people's teen years. This sense that there is an objective truth that only you and those who agree with you can see.Unfortunately, so far all you have done is claim a group of people exist and are doing something bad and then shown a definition of them. This is not a proof it is a hypothesis (and I'm using that word very generously here)The fact is you haven't shown me these people. Where are these people? Are they a minority? Are they prolific? Are they relevant to this video? Are they really doing the things you say? Do they identify with the terms you use? Can you provide evidence of them?These are rhetorical questions at this point as this conversation is over for me. I hope in the future you will learn to substantiate your arguments and acknowledge legitimate challenges to that argument. It genuinely is a pity that you failed to understand the principles that could have made this discussion worthwhile. See you later	Nothing	Age - Youngsters	1/451	0.222

Also is it ok to call rape if my ex hugged me but now we fell out, because by your logic, that should be ok. Yes there are abusive men around the world and it needs to stop, but women are just as capable as being as destructive as man, stop trying to get yourself attention by practically saying "all men are a holes", because then we give instances of "women being a holes" , things that women can do which they couldn't 100 years ago 1.Vote2.Work in industrial3. kumagin yurier You're being completely disingenuous. When people complain about videos in which women lie about being abused, you suggest men simply ignore the videos and stop complaining about them. Is that really what you think? That it's okay for people to lie and anyone who has a problem with dishonesty should turn their head?There are genuine victims who talk about genuine problems they face. However, you're throwing the baby out with the bathwater when you dismiss all criticisms of people claiming they were abused. Some people have legitimate stories, others have been caught lying. We can support actual victims while calling out frauds, we don't have to always support claims of sexual abuse or always oppose such claims, we can look at the evidence and judge all stories individually. Furthermore, your claim that if men really cared about abuse victims, they'd advocate awareness of male abuse. This is a false dichotomy. Many people genuinely care about abuse victims, yet they are mostly familiar with female abuse, which causes them to overlook male victims. There are also plenty of people who do spread awareness of male abuse. RAINN.org does a great job addressing all forms of sexual abuse and it's a great example of awareness done right.There's plenty of sexism in this world, but you're only looking at sexism women face. What sexism men face you either ignore or blame on men."After all, women's takes on issues are only worth anything if they're opinions palatable to guys"Or, maybe, your sharing flawed opinions with men who have a good head on their shoulder. You claim they're criticizing you because you're a woman, but really they're criticizing you because you're wrong. Rarely do I hear legitimate examples of women having their opinions brushed aside due to their gender. Usually, their opinions are brushed aside because their opinions are wrong. It's like claiming the world is flat and that all the men correcting you are simply being sexist when they say you're wrong.	Gender, Sexism, Sexual, Woman	Gender - General	7/334	2.096

I worked in GAME this winter and had the same things happen to me. It's a real riot!I had just finished serving this woman when she looked at my male co-worker and said: 'You'll probably know the answer to this question. When is Star Wars Battlefront 2 coming out?'Both me and my co-worker just stood there like... what in the hell? He answered the question; I added some more information since I was the one actually planning on getting the game myself and also to rather smugly show this woman that hey, I know what the hell I'm talking about actually, without being confrontational :) It's a mess and it's just sad that I don't think I know any woman who's worked in GAME and hasn't had a customer be super weird about it! Women are the worst really haha. I worked at gamestation at the same time also as a Xmas temp we had to ware the fat Chris T-shirts oh how I hated the T-shirt and the adverts, just before I was did a free years work through school and they kept giving me bs we wanted you to go college and kept hiring awful people over me I basically was you but male haha told to basically attack them when they stepped in but I always choose to do other work let them try themselves then swoop in if they needed help dealt with language, education and age barriers I was good as long as dancing, singing or sports games didn't pop up haha but the only bad thing I ever did was trying to trick a woman who I knew was the mother of a friend I almost got her to buy him a pink PSP under the disguise of it being cheaper I almost had her and was waiting for the jokes punchline but I was weak, but even though at the time game bought gamestation I always thought there was a difference like when I went into a game store to just ask some questions about the Kinect sensor I spoke to a girl who clearly wasn't a gamer and was there for the paycheck she said I don't know so I went to the assistant manager as that was the only other person on the shop floor at the time gave me some pr bs speech then roped the girl into it saying I have my pre-ordered what about you then she agreed with everything said she had it pre-ordered as well and all I could think was how could someone pre-order something they didn't know what it was so I just learnt to never go near the girl and guy ever again but learnt the guy only ever play FIFA and formula1 which I never consider games hell it was basically our generation of pong but then sadly gamestation lost staff that were replaced with game staff when both stores were shutting store and then in my area there were no real store that could give detail information there was like two employees but he and she were always working on my education off days so I was never was in town on those days, then the ultimate fate happened young people couldn't get temp jobs there it was full of 40 and 50 year olds that didn't game which I ask they were forced into the jobs by the government and so I stopped applying and I almost sounded like a conspiracy nut at the time saying they are out to stop me from buying the games haha	Age, Fat, Woman	Age - General, Gender - General, Physical Identity - Physical Features	3/465	0.645

I remember my interview for game and I chose to pitch Mirrors Edge in sheer panic.... still got the job though ha!I had one customer who came up to my till and proceeded to ask questions to MY COLLEAGUE who was standing at the other till. He completely ignored me and gave eye contact to my male friend, he then asked what Bioshock was like and my colleague said "I haven't played that, but Sophie has". He then had to look at me and just said "Oh.. really?"I really didn't experience much face to face sexism in my 5 years but perhaps that's because all customers would completely ignore me and go to my male counterparts. I'd ask "Do you need help?" and they'd respond no and proceed to the tills to ask my male colleagues. It got better as the years went on and regulars would know my face and know I did indeed play games. It helped when I customised my lanyard with pins of different games I played. I really like the way that you put this video together. It gets the point across without complaining too much, dragging on the stories, and thankfully keeping your voice sounding cheery the entire time. I've noticed how ignorant some people can be when it comes to how they treat the people helping them through stores, regardless of gender, and it's quite frustrating. When it comes to something along gaming, a lot of people say that men/boys are better at knowing everything about games, but I completely disagree. Nowadays, it's actually quite common that I run into women that know just as much about video games as I do, even more sometimes, and I don't mind. It's not like games are gender specific, just like how really everything shouldn't be, even though some things are just pushed into being that way. Coming from the LGBT community, I see conversations about stereotypes all the time, and I hate hearing them. It's one of the reasons why I wish people would just shut up and listen sometimes, because not everyone fits into the "Oh, I'm this gender, or this type of person, so this is everything that I'm allowed to do, while this is everything I'm not allowed to do", because the real world doesn't work that way. While I am in no way a hater of women's rights movements, I believe that (by what I've seen and by what I've been shown), that a lot of the feminist movement (or, more so, those that try to spearhead the movement), have treated it as if men are the issue, and while I'm not turning that down, that yes, there are some men that are complete jerks and don't consider women to be humans, and mere objects, there are a lot of men that wouldn't treat someone, if anyone at all, like an object. I've stuck to being as respectful as I can, because I'm aware that women are just as capable as men are at many things, even if stereotypes have attempted to paint them in a worse light. I've seen women capable of doing things that I couldn't even dare to try, and that's impressive to me. I wish that more people realized this, and that people would try to shut up and listen for a few minutes. Is it too late into this comment to mention I'm from the Americas? Either way, you did an amazing job recapping the stories, and it's great to hear how you deal with it now, than having held a constant grudge over it for all this time, while still showing that it is something that is an important issue to address. It's not often that I watch anything like this, due to how YouTube handles recommendations of this type of stuff, as well as hating how negative everything is in those types of videos normally. I stopped being a physical customer for many reasons but one of the tops ones is lack of stocking things I'd actually buy and the staff not knowing what the hell they are on about. Also in regards to females I do remember one woman working as a temp saying she was a mobile gamer so she didn't know anything about what was stocked in the shop... Our power tools expert, whom worked there for years and worked on weekends with her husband as a Hitachi sales rep, was an attractive younger woman. Yeah, there were definitely guys who would blow her off, thinking they know better, but that seemed to be kind of be regular with how guys treated all of us working there (thinking you don't know shit). But what she would complain fairly regularly when women would come in looking for something for themselves, or for their husband/s.o., and would blatantly tell her to her face that they needed a man to help them because she couldn't possibly know what they need. I'm somewhat guilty of this. I'm a man and I wouldn't expect a female workers to know much about the products shes selling unless it was a typically female product(eg I'd go to a woman for style and decorating things, but a man for hardware and materials)In my experience with working in retail, I find that most companies these days hire people to fill quotas rather than ability, and also that everyone unemployed typically fills in 100's of random applications and will just say anything they can to get any job – end result is often alot of people selling products they're not particularly capable of selling so I usually just go for the statistical likeliness that the person who looks the part is probably the one who knows the most. Not gonna lie, from what my female friends told me, other women hammer them down more often than sexist dudes. I met this girl and she just went through a break up and it was ugly, so I helped her. FYI she’s gay so I stand no chance in getting poon for being a ”nice guy”. Just clearing that out of the way. Anywho, I basically helped her reorient her life and goals and shit. Instead of ”She was my world Dx” I managed to convince her to change her mindset to putting herself in the center of her world, not someone else that might up and leave and leave her weak and useless. Shit like that, shit we learn after making that same mistake. So, after like a year, she was doing great. She’s a go-getter, owned her college assignments like a baws, doesn’t rely on people and became someone people can rely on, dudes got wow-ed, doesn’t break down as often, she look like she got her shit together. I was proud of her. And then her female friends came to destroy what I helped build. They discouraged her attempt at self-sufficiency, feeding her shit about being a woman and rely more on men, be dependent and meek and clingy and sappy and all that sexist shit. She got shook, questioning her progress, because deep down inside, she’s still insecure about herself. While she did get back up again instead of returning back to the soppy mess from before, it really pissed me off that her female friends see her rising out of the gender stereotype as something bad. Worst part is they managed to sound like they did it out of worry and love. There’s also the old hags that can’t keep up with the times. The shit they said about career women when they gossip, worse than the shit I said about my worst enemy behind his back. Even my friend’s fiancée thinks she should quit her job after they get married even though her career is on track and she’ll be hitting the big bucks in 5 years or less, all because ”Well, I’m a woman . Women aren’t suited for executive jobs like that.” which is funny because both her mom and her elder sister each runs their own business. When I was thirteen I was playing with a group of boys, and a few of them were 18. They were very nice and fun when they thought I was a young boy. They were talking about hot girls and I was giggling and agreeing because I was a closeted bi, and all of a sudden they asked me if I had a crush. I said yes, and that he was really cool. They started to laugh and asked if I was gay . I said no I'm a girl. It was silent, before who I thought was my close friend started to hoot and holler and told me to get the fuck off. I was shocked and asked them what's the difference, that before they knew I was a girl they didn't act like this. They told me I was an attention seeker, for being bi, and liking games. They kicked me off the party and unfriended me. I never saw them again.Although I had found a new group that didn't care and were normal fucking human beings, that experience scarred me. It made me wary of when to speak in games. I know that they probably were just shocked to know the person they had been playing with had been totally different to what they imagined, so they lashed out but they shouldn't have gone so far, and done so much to begin with. I've forgiven them in my heart, even though they probably felt bad after.	Gay	Sexual Identity - General, Sexual Identity - Male homosexuality	2/249	0.803
Haha, I got kind of the same deal, but I'm a man and used to work in a baby clothes store, for years. I'd meet people I would insist on telling them "ma'am/sir, at the weight you're telling me and the age of the baby, I'm afraid that is NOT the size you want, this one is". Usually they'd want someone else. The1dBumblebee Buddy, you know the victim card right? Well feminists have said that women can't be sexist since they're victims of sexism . Well that's what I'm getting at. Not many people understand when they've just experienced sexism and especially if it comes from a woman and for those who have, they keep it quiet because an anecdote about a sexist female doesn't help feminists. The thing is everyone experiences sexism from everyone at one point or another. Those other female YouTubers have experienced sexism from other women but rather than saying they have, they just blame society. One of the things I've observed: if sexism comes from males its patriarchy , if sexism comes from females its society essentially removing all responsibility off the female offenders.I have experienced sexism as a guy. TBH I didn't care but a few times it's a from women saying "you're a man, you need to do can't do...". They're minor experiences but they're sexist nonetheless. People would be surprised at the amount of women that make sexist comments like that. it was sexist, but imagine the roles were reversed and you were trying to buy something from a female dominated market and a man tried to attend to you. I know not everyone would be put off by this, but factor in shopping stress + time , etc. Additionally each game has different demographics, so if you are going to argue that men and women don't have different perspectives on games they like to play, you would be factually incorrect. If that still isn't conving imagine you were buying a product worth a lot of money, say , 200K , and it was a product that had a large sex bias in its customer base, you want to make sure you are purchasing the best gift you can for your hard earned cash. Every person is different and you can't tell someone's experience by their appearance. That's ignorant and discriminatory. I worked in a game store where I was the woman that played RPGs, platformers, puzzle games and music games. My manager was the woman that played shooters and sports. We had a guy that was the Nintendo fanboy. We all had different expertise and interests, but we would also learn from each other. We would read magazines, talk to each other or talk to customers in order to learn more about the games we didn't play. If we didn't know on the spot we would ask whoever else was working that day. If you want expert advise then ask them who the expert is on that product or do the research online. It's not offensive to ask a woman who the expert on a particular product is, but it is to avoid her or request to talk to a man. If she's helping you and you don't think she knows what she's talking about then ask what other employees might think, ask for a second opinion or just leave and shop somewhere that hires people that know the products they are selling. Now if you're embarrassed or don't feel comfortable talking to a particular sex , then that's a different situation.	Sex, Woman	Gender - General	4/218	1.835

I've been one of those guys that the customer's consider an 'expert'. I used to work in Sports Direct, it was my first day and i was manning the Football Boots section. A lady brought her kids in to buy some new football boots and she had no idea what she was looking for. The kids obviously wanted the most expensive ones but in this case she wanted some advice. My colleague ( who was a woman who had worked in that section for 3 years and could easily be considered an expert) approached them as she was looking a bit lost. The lady completely dismissed her, said I need that mans help, walked right past and came to me asking for advice. But Im sure that both of us wish we were the lucky Americans with their crazy good stocks. Anyways I do agree with your stories on sexism , because I used to work at a firearms store, and I was usually just there to help female/firsttime shooters pick a good gun that had light recoil so that they could use it. But what really happened was that when I told my female customers about the guns, they acted as if my male co workers were more gun savy, so most of them, just stood away from the counter, and waited for a male worker, I mean its not the worst thing that has happened to me on a job, but still I can pull my own weight just as much as any dude. I work for [removed so I don't get fired] and I think this is just an issue with people in general and their attitude towards people they view as inferior - Sales people in shops - rather than any fault with [removed so I don't get fired] themselves (which I acknowledge you seem to agree with me on). The vast majority of people I've worked with have been great (as are the majority of customers too!) and I've been doing this job most of my adult life.Outside of the typical inappropriate comments women likely get no matter what they're doing or where they are, they also have to deal with socially inept young men who don't get to meet women very often, focusing a lot of attention on them because the woman is a captive audience when she's at work. I imagine this is the case for women in any customer service role but I think in gaming focused retail, you get particularly socially inept men coming into the store - it's rarely sexually aggressive (Although it can be) but it's still uncomfortable for said employee. In my store, one of our female employees has several customers who come in every day, quite often specifically to talk to her for extended periods, many of them just come to talk to her because she's charming and funny and great to chat to about games (and she enjoys talking to these customers) but some of them clearly come in because she's a girl who will talk to them and mistake that for something more. As she's quite shy, she doesn't want to offend them and also doesn't want to potentially cause an incident at work with a customer - it hasn't been made clear in our training at work how we should react in these situations so we generally will call her into the stock room to do some work in there until the customer leaves. It can be very awkward and several customers have had to be asked to come to the store less often and not to speak to her as often because it makes her feel so uncomfortable. I really do not envy women working in retail, in particular in any kind of "nerdy" shop.I get flack infrequently from customers because I'm Jewish (Maybe once a month if that). Obviously, it doesn't come up often but sometimes customers will ask about my plans for Christmas and I'll tell them I'm Jewish or a colleague or regular customer will mention it - sometimes when people overhear in the queue, they won't be served by me (people of... ahem... a "rival" religion or people - generally students - who I assume do it out of anti-Zionist fury) or will make comments like "Typical Jew" when I try and upsell a product. I can laugh at myself and I can give as good as I get so I don't mind when someone makes a cheeky Jew joke just like if someone made a friendly joke about the colour of my hair or the phrasing I used in a particular sentence but some people are just outright antisemitic and it does always make me sad when it happens. This is something I face in general, in fairness, and isn't specific to my work - my colleagues in store would always defend me (but the know I can fight my own battles and don't need them to) and I'm pretty confident that the business at large would also have my back on this issue were it to go any further (when a customer described me as Jewish in a complaint made about me, they dismissed it outright and were professionally curt in their response).Retail, eh? It sucks and I can't wait to get out of it next year when I move abroad.	Woman	Gender - General	1/641	0.156

Damian Walls, happened a lot in tech support too. I dunno how many times I was called up and was straight up told to transfer to a male tech before I had a chance to resolve anything. Internal transfers were prohibited on these grounds so thankfully it had the built-in revenge of the customer needing to go back through the automated voice routing system.Eventually I got onto a conract so small that every member of the team was within koosh ball throwing distance. Calls could take eons because techs on the other end sometimes needed to hike between the printer and router. Oftentimes someone like this would call in, debate furiously about how I should be able to transfer them to a guy, hang up, go through the routing system again and ping the next available tech... Me.I once had a guy go three times around and boy was he pissed. All other techs were on massivly long calls and I had the fortune of just getting a bunch of short burnout calls (cold reset, re-seat it, still not working, here´s a new one). The guy was every second call three times in a row. Demanded he be transferred to a manager who did have the power to transfer calls between agents but the manager refused to transfer him based on sexist bull (he was an awesome manager). The manager told him that all the techs are equally capable of solving his problem and that if he wants to he can play ring-around-the-routing system all bloody day as far as he was concerned. The guy hung up and called back and got THE ONLY OTHER FEMALE TECH ON THE CONTRACT. At this point we were all aware of the drama unfolding and laughing our collective asses off with mute button employed. The guy gave in, worked with the tech who cleared his problem in 7 minutes. Each time going through routing probably killed between 5-10 minutes.It was a little insulting but damn was it ever funny.	Hike	Nationality - Italian	1/339	0.295

When I worked at a game store I got the same issues. For me it was mostly guys that I had issues with, but it wasn't that common . The best justice was the one time a guy came in wanting to buy a new game system to play with his bros. I starting talking to him and tried to see what he wanted (basically he wanted to play sports games and shooter games and playing DVDs was a bonus). My other co-worker (a Nintendo fanboy) chimed in and started pitching the Gamecube to him. The guy immediately stopped talking to me and only listened to my co-worker. Once I realized he was ignoring me I shrugged and let him buy the wrong system. Don't get me wrong, the Gamecube is an awesome system, but not the one this guy wanted. The first was not an instance of sexism in my opinion as it seemed as though the only other people in the store were male and she noticed this and hence forth specified by saying guys, she also seemed frustrated probably as she wanted to go home or else where but her son was moaning about the headphones, plus the fact you didn't understand her son after 3 attempts at listening to him, as a result I don't see that event as sexist. This...prejudice is weird, but also understandable. Lady, you are, let's say, a rare kind of female. Most of the retail employees in game stores, are males, so of course there is a reason you "stand" out. However, the way these women treated you was hideous. I would be in my case, the granpa, somewhat sceptical, but not ignorant of someone's skills.Also, think it that way. How many times have you walked in a PC store(not an Apple store) and asked a female employee for the latest Z370 architecture in their motherboards' supply that has at least 2 PCIE lanes, or the best Intel CPU for value in the market right now. I bet the answer is either 0 or an dramatically low number, and the reason for this is that women do not actually choose to devote such a large amount of time to know such stuff for, in this case tech.In the contrary, say how many times have you seen a male in a cosmetics store, and you particularly asked him for the best contouring option there is of your favorite brand. I believe the answer is also quite low.To sum up, it is about career choice and human interaction motives. When someone is rooting for a certain motive, which in this situation is male employees in a game store, that someone could and might do an act of sexism. The same applies to many situations, but you should ALWAYS see an employee as a professional who happens to be male/female.	Apple, Sexism, Weird	Ethnicity - Native-American, Gender - General, Physical Identity - Physical (and Mental) Impairments	3/255	1.176

I worked at GameStop when I was 15 and the number of times I had people tell me they didn't want my help because I was a girl was way more often then I like to admit. I remember this one older woman who came in with her grandson. He wanted to trade in a few games so he could buy the newest CoD at the time. I informed the woman that the game was rated M and her grandson didn't appear to be 18. He looked about 12-13. She rolled her eyes at me and started to yell at the top of her lungs about me assuming age , working in a place that didn't fit the gender role of a young lady and to let her grandson buy the game. I told her again that the game was rated M and that she would have to buy it for him. She started yelling again, now catching the attention of the others in the store. Ahaha, that is an evergreen, happened so many times to me albeit in a different format. In my case, my mother is very hardworking, and reached a peak of success where there are very few women. Just yesterday, I was buying glasses from a lady in her shop, and we were lovingly chit chatting. It happened she told me about a vacation she was going to do, and I gave her a few pieces of advice. When asked how I knew so much I explained that my mother was assigned in that region as a "governor", and I lived with her there for a few years... yet in the following conversation, the shop lady kept saying "... so your father did this and that...". It mattered not my answering with "yes my mother", she kept assuming I was somehow mixing my parents.I kinda of suppose this happens mostly with women for a reason: men do not really think about how hard is working for women, because they are not affected by it. Averagely, no man is really more surprised by a woman success than of a man success, because working is taken for granted and there is nothing strange if someone is able to excel.Yet all women FEEL the weight of the discrimination done by those that actively really hold a prejudice. And depending on the society, it may be so massive to the point that the women are the first to assume it is highly improbable for a woman to hold a certain position of power, or that certain realms of knowledge are beyond reach. We are yet to really breach gender understanding.	Gender, Nothing, Woman	Age - Youngsters, Gender - General	4/276	1.449

Wrong argument. It is not the initial assumption to be wrong per se: by experience, you may think that female gamers are not really competent, or that the first person you hear when calling a studio is the secretary, or that it is quite improbable for a woman to cover a set position; yet the rudeness lies in ignoring the facts presented to you, and sticking to your assumption despite anything else.There is nothing sexist in humans performing their role at their best. Males have by default more strength, but there are also very weak males and pumped up females, so the point is not the sex , but if you have or not have the required physical perks to do a set job. (Which is also why I hate the idea of pink quotes, the way of the government to guarantee women have a set percentage minimum of jobs in any company is hurting the fight to obtain true meritocracy)	Nothing, Sex, Woman	Age - Youngsters, Gender - General	3/161	1.863
"yet the rudeness lies in ignoring the facts presented to you, and sticking to your assumption despite anything else."I can understand that , but my argument is whether things like assuming boys are more knowledgeable and quicker to serve customers who have no idea what their children want to play -things like assuming the female voice answering calls to a business is likely a secretary - is blatant sexism or the law of averages at play and whether calling these issues sexism does any service to women who deal with real sexism but are scoffed at and dismissed because of middle class white western 1st world problem having spoiled little children, bringing up clearly benign instances of common rudeness and playing the victim of a life long systemic daily prejudice based on sex instead of recognizing everyone has to eat a shit sandwich and a little personal accountability goes along way to be treated as an equal rather than a lesser demanding special treatment and screaming blatant sexism every time reality doesn't give it to you. Honestly, and I say this as a woman with plenty of experience of this sort, it sounds to me like people just confused you for an inexperienced seasonal temp worker... probably because of the combo of the different shirt and your shyness. Most stores have different levels of employees wear different tops; the higher up you are the more formal your uniform will be (usually). Customers know this and generally try to seek out the most experienced looking person on the floor when they want advice on something. Especially during the holiday season when people are already flustered and don't want to spend any more time than is absolutely necessary in those crowded shops. I really really don't think this was sexism . I really really think people just labelled you as an inexperienced, junior level, young, shy employee and assumed that the men working were more senior , more knowledgeable, had been working there longer, etc. Now, those assumptions could be based on sexism , but I really think in this instance they were based mostly on you having the yellow t-shirt instead of the official uniform.. combined with other things I've mentioned like age and shyness.It does suck to be in these kinds of situations though, regardless of the underlying reasons. I'm sure you'll find as you get older and gain more work experience that you are treated differently. Shitty situations do still happen though, especially in retail. Hugs and empathy from me! As someone who lives in Sweden i have to disagree with "all of those crazy women are in america" haha, but seriously though it's actually a huge problem here, i want to believe that rational feminists exists but I've never met one in real life, and I'm not trying to be being passively rude!, they will end friendships over what political party you vote for, they will say things like you're not allowed to have an opinion as a white male, 50 of men support rape etc, these types of people hold an abnormal amount of power in Sweden, you've probably heard our government proclaim to be the worlds first Feminist government? Our government refers to domestic violence as "mens violence against women", we have several extremely severe laws that discriminate against men, officials within the domestic abuse field once kidnapped a young woman; drove her around sweden and finland while keeping her locked up for her "own safety" and scaring her with how they were being hunted by a pedophilia ring run by "men", not a big deal until you realize some of the people responsible STILL WORK FOR THE GOVERNMENT!!!, the same group of people(radical feminists) also spread mass hysteria within Sweden about "men" kidnapping and sacrificing babies in Satanistic rituals to the point where it was a national hysteria and the police around the country would invest serious resources investigating, they also refereed to men as "animals" and yes they're still around today "helping women" from the horrors of ALL MEN, we had numerous "psychiatrists" and feminists manipulate their children in an epidemic of false molestation testimonies(thankfully this never got out of hand "too much"..), our version of metoo was so out of control an innocent man was driven to kill himself by our media, not to mention various horrible murders, witch hunts by hordes of young "feminists" on social media doxxing and harrassing various innocent people, homes being vandalized, and the acceptance of abuse against men; i can't even count how many times women have hit and even molested me (both strangers and friends)... i could go on all day but i think you get the idea, and it's not because they're "bad people" it's just that the narrative is so fucking twisted in sweden that they don't see anything wrong with it and see no reason to reflect on themselves.I understand the need to defend something people view as good, but we need to realize that when we defend any label it tempts people to do bad things while telling themselves they're good because they belong to something people think of as good, it becomes a shield they can hide behind and no amount of "not real feminism" is going to change that :/, the label from my point of view does a lot more harm today than good, at least in the west.If you think defending a simple word is worth it, give it some more thought.

Mestis "Actual" sexism is still alive and kicking. Things have gotten better but when a woman is in any position of authority, advisory or non-traditional role this kind of thing happens more often than you might suspect. I have worked tech support, security and eventually construction and while guys on the crews I worked for were perfectly happy to treat me like one of the guys it was wicked hard to be hired. I had it through the grapevine that a lot of the bosses feared a girl on the crew was going to be a given sexual harassment suit so they just didn't hire women. Part of the compact one makes when taking one of these jobs as a woman is that you deal with the sexism yourself, you don't escalate it unless it is criminal. I learned to deal with people treating me like I am incapable of lifting heavy items or using powertools even after they've watched me easily lift +100lbs, zip boards with a saw or pop holes in walls. Over time it becomes depressing because no matter how experienced I get or how adept I become I have to earn that recognition. Every. Single. Time. Nobody ever takes it for granted like they do the fellas. There are days it makes me want to scream with frustration because it never ends. It never will end. Not in the foreseeable future. On every new crew I must prove myself over and over again and every time there are people who treat my aptitude as just being a cute novelty. Yes sexism still exists and I face it every damn day because if I don't then what hope have the girls and women who come after me. Ctfc Cc To be fair, I think that's more instinctive in that instance, but I get your point.. A lot of people view mothers as THE child care takers. Sure, both parents work together, and everyone has a different family life, but the mother is often the one who spends the most time with the children, in nature (let's not talk about turtles) and in society's views on family life. Or at least my society's.It's easy to trust a woman , because in a man's head it's just a naturally occurring idea that women like children. Why else would they bother consenting to pushing 8 pounds of baby out of themselves after 9 months of bloating and sickness? Love. Or strict adherence to your religious beliefs. (I would hit the abort button so fast, I'm terrified of getting a kidney stone as it is!)But yeah. There are a lot of terrible people out there, gender shouldn't be what makes us trust a person, but it generally makes the whole process easier if you find a way to trust people, I guess.And I trust in man's ability to be awful idiots. Yeah, working in retail usually ends up resulting in encounters with idiots who for one reason or another act like you don't know what you're doing, despite the fact that they say things that show they have a complete lack of understanding of how any of what they're whining about works. Just yesterday I overheard a customer whining about how the store I work in didn't have any of the 4 packs of Egg Custards (If anyone doesn't know what they are, look them up, they're delicious) and because they were cheaper than 2 of the 2 packs she was asking if she could have the 2 separate packs for the same price as the 4 pack, my colleague handled it well, called a manager to check for this customer, and when my colleague got off the phone she apologised and said that the manager had told her that she couldn't reduce the price like that. So the logical response was clearly to get bitchy about how it's just not good enough and how she shouldn't have to pay more when it says that an offer is on, she complained that it was misleading advertising (It states the exact bloody product that is on offer) so yeah, some people are just dumb .Another one I got was a customer handing me two vouchers yesterday, for which she had not spent enough to use them, so I checked and handed them back, apologising and making sure she knew that she hadn't spent enough to use them on the transaction, to which she started muttering about how ridiculous it was that she had to spend that much to use them (About £5 more than she'd spent) but she was glaring at me as if I was ripping her off... Maybe if she'd... you know... used her bloody eyes and read the vouchers she might have known how much she needed to get, but that would be sensible... Its really sad but unfortunately when your in roles that work with customers its a possibility. I will never forget when my female colleague got a phone call from a man who asked her to transfer him to a male since she wouldn't know what he was talking about and honestly the thought of people doing that gets me really angry. People who work in those job roles often get treated more like pieces of furniture anyway more than actual human beings and thats something we all experience but sexism towards people that are only doing there job to try to help you. We don't know the gender make up of the place for instance, in an all female staff, would you hire a man who has better CV over a woman who might have worse but is a woman ? I don't know personally because I haven't researched how hiring managers decide on who is to join a company, who's a good teamplayer etc.But something tells me that neither did you and as such my comment simply questioned the immediate knee jerk of the OP that there might be a circumstance he is unaware of or is purposefully omitting to make it look like he is a victim of inequality when in reality there might be a good reason to why he wasn't hired. Gender make up of the place? Once again, why does this matter? 2nd, yes I would, because you shouldn't base qualifications based on gender or race.... You didn't simply question the "knee jerk". You questioned the conclusion that diversity/gender quotas for common workplace jobs are complete nonsense."Actually they were justified in doing so, there's marketing to be of concern to a business and keeping a diversified workplace to possibly increase productiveness."How were you questioning the "knee jerk" in your one sentence troubleshoot of liberal spill? Also, I know how people (The people/person are usually the district managers or store owners. Matters how big the company/business is.) usually decide on hiring managers outside gender quota crap. It is usually based on experience with working with others (as in, have they ever coordinated anything. As in projects.), how long they have been in the certain sector for, and general management skills/recommendations. What? You think I don't talk to district managers, store owners, or just regular old store managers because I work in a different sector? Gender and race quotas exist and most people know it is bs.	Common, Gender, Old, Race	Age - Over 65s, Ethnicity - General, Gender - General, Social Class - Working class	8/187	4.278
BarelySane This seems to be something that you've either just jumped to the conclusion of or you are deliberately twisting his words? So you're flat out denying that this form sexism that he talked happens against men? There was a girl in my work who was lazy and treated everyone else like shit, she used the fact she was a woman as a shield not to get fired. In fact you just making that comment is a representation of a double standard against men in itself "What you're a man? You can't be discriminated against!" ”And as I mentioned yeah, a man as a manager in an all female workforce also carries certain connotations, it may be good or it may be bad, I am not a hiring manager but this is what a hiring manager definitely considers worthy to look into.”So, you believe in sexism right? What if it was the other way around where the workforce was all males? Doesn’t this invalidate the video you are commenting on? People disrespected her because she is working in a rather male inclusive sector. Also, the personality test is used by nearly everyone and the test doesn’t really change all that much between companies. If the personality test truly weeded out individuals then you would see a inclusiveness form within the business. However, Google has many different communities within its company that function independently. As does every other company. One last thing, being skeptical is fine, but outright denying it and submitting your own ”truth” is wrong as well. It isn’t that far-fetched that a company denys someone based on race and gender to fit a quota, because there are laws moderating this and grants given to companies that follow it.	Gender, Race, Sexism	Ethnicity - General, Gender - General	3/196	1.531

In my work there was a woman who treated everyone like crap and she was lazy, she used the fact she was female as shield for not getting the sack. In fact, just your comment itself represents a double standard against men "You can't be discriminated against! You're a man!" Getting hired for a job during the holidays, the pain and suffering of it all. I got a job at a grocery store back in 2001(Raley's) and it was so bad at the start. I had really bad anxiety as it is and the whole situation of this didn't help it any. Not only did my store director who hired say, "You can't call in sick or you're fired", but dealing with all the people didn't help. Of course it's winter and people are coming in sick and of course I get sick. It was to the point I lost my voice and was panicking. I mean what was I suppose to do, my mom was nice enough to call the store(I was still living with my parents) and she read off what I was writing off. It's bad enough he didn't care and basically said, "He need to be here regardless or he's fired", but he's being rude to my mom for trying to help me out. I did talk to the district manager who's basically he's boss and he got moved out of this store location and 2 months later "retired" from what I was told. I manage to get through that day thanks to my older sister who made this herbal drink from this book she had and allowed me to have a low raspy voice vs no voice. So thanks to her for that.I think the 2 and a half years I was there I had 3 total bad customers, every other customers were fine. They just wanted their stuff bagged, some a certain way, but no big deal and were on their way. So the first was this weird lady, I really don't remember what was triggering her, but she came up with 2 or 3 tomato's and I was just trying to find out if she wanted, "Paper or plastic." After asking a few time she finally turned to me and glares at me for interrupting the "conversation(yelling at him)" cashier and says, "I DON'T GIVE A , PUT IT IN  PLASTIC YOU LITTLE !!!" I was taken aback, but just proceeded to do so. When she was leaving I just smile and said, "Have a nice day." She turned and said, " YOU!!" I never saw crazy lady again while I worked there. Second one wasn't really at me, but I was still in the general area and it was just odd. So there's a cafe in the store and they close at like 8pm and this person comes in at like 8:30pm. He pushed the button that calls for cafe services and one of the people who's cleaning up just says, "I'm sorry we're closed." They get upset and as they leaving the employee says, "Have a nice evening." and they basically get a rude gesture with a, "Screw you." Me and my employee look at each other and just start laughing. I mean at this point I've gotten use to dealing with things around the store and didn't let too much bother me.The last customer was around the holiday after I was hired, I was working the swing shift up til closing on Christmas eve and we're closing up for the evening. The manager hands the key off to one of the other Courtesy Clerks and he's a pretty short and skinny guy. So as he was trying to lock up the door this lady comes up to the door and was like, "I need flour." He told her, "I'm sorry we're closed for the night." This lady was determined to get the flour she needed. Before he could lock the door she forces it open and the poor guy had very little time, but manage to get out of the way and not be crushed in-between the door and rail the divided the in/out door. As this was happening and she ran to the aisle the flour was on the night crew was making red alert noise and saying, "Crazy lady who need flour is on the war path for a bag of flour." Sexism from women always hurts 10 times more. Once I moved into a house with 2 other male students and whole place was insanely dirty. I came in the evening and was busy unpacking. The next day the house owner and his wife come in to check on us and the wife starts scolding me real hard on the state of the whole house. I want to share a story with you. One time I went to, believe it or not, GAME to inform me of the "new" console at the time. I was looking the prices of the two consoles because, well they are priced a bit different. Mind you, I was a Nintendo kid, so I've never touched a play or any other consoles until the x-box came out. I didn't know what was the "best" one to buy for the price range, thus I went and stare very hard at the consoles to see what they have. A female employee ask me if I needed some help and I said "actually, yes". I asked a, somewhat, technical question and, believe it or not, she stared at me and said what the box said. Obviously that didn't answer my question, so I asked her again phrasing it a bit differently. The thing is, I'm from Mexico and I have a USA accent (guess why), thus I was a bit worried that I didn't phrase it correctly... but I did it. She glared at me with a face that said "I already told you" while repeating it again. She asked me, "any thing else?", I said, "no thanks" and keep looking at the consoles. What she did afterwards was unbelievable: she went to one of her coworkers and told him what dumb and nerdy I was, it was just a console. Her coworker asked her what was the question and she said to him my question from A to Z. He looked at her and said to her "go and catch a break" (or something like that). He approached me very nicely and asked me if I have a doubt. I asked him my question and he told me the answer that I was looking for.To make thing worse, that happened to me two more times (without the rude part) with female employees at game stores. So, what was the moral of the story? Ask google before going to a store.	Dumb	Physical Identity - Physical (and Mental) Impairments	1/339	0.295
Wow, this is horrible! I used to work at Game, along with a few other girls who worked at the same store, and never found this problem at all.... thankfully! I'm so sorry you went through this. I still remember my days at Game so fondly, it was such a fun job while I was at uni. Sure there were bad customers but I was never discriminated because of my sex, and just as well because I would not have been able to handle it coolly the way you did. Your story about the woman who said to her husband to ask for one of the boys actually reminds me of stories my mum told me about from her youth. She used to notice that if she was speaking to a couple about a sale, the woman would always look extremely prickly and sour if she was talking to the bloke, even if the product they were looking for was clearly for the husband/boyfriend. So, my mum changed her tactic and started looking and speaking directly to the woman, and she said she noticed a huge difference. The edge would disappear and they'd be smiling at her. She realized that these women were clearly threatened by her, which was ridiculous, and so by talking just to the women it seemed to ease them up a bit.... But this was back in the early 80s! I can't believe this nonsense would still be going on....	Sex, Woman	Gender - General	4/244	1.639

I've always said this but I've found very recently that women tend to judge you a lot quicker although I did once have an experience that could be considered sexist by a guy. Basically, I work in Shoezone (you can guess what type of store that is) and during the summer we accept school grants for parents to get school shoes for their kids. Usually, anyone can do these transactions but someone in store has been messing up so for a while only supervisors and above could deal with them. Two men and a boy came in with one so I had to call my supervisor to do it, then one of the men roughly stated (my memory is a bit fuzzy on the actual words)"Ahh, looks like you need a man to help you do it, this is why men are better, isn't that right boys". The other two nodded and agreed with him. I thought he was joking around so I just faked a smile and laughed. Then he said "That's also why men are always in charge, to make sure everything goes right. You can't trust a woman to be in charge" To that I just responded, "our supervisor may be a man but our manager is woman and does very well without the aid of men" (Well that's what I responded in my head 10 minutes later). Anyway, my supervisor arrived and I walked away to calm myself.	Fuzzy, Woman	Ethnicity - Black, Gender - General	3/243	1.235

a small story from my local game, now i don't work at Game, but i do like to hang out there, to chat about games and get a few cheep hidden gems, but while i was chatting a customer came up so i stopped chatting so she could sort out the customers, the child wanted to get GTAV that was coming out in a month at the time, and she was trying to explain to the mother of the kid that she cannot pre-order a game rated 18 for a child under the age of 18, and the mother got pissy saying that she didn't know what was in the game and that it would be fine, she then turned to me and started asking me about the game, calmly i said "i don't work here, while i can tell you what i know about the game i must recommend you to the person who helped me get all the info i needed" she said that would be lovely and asked me for 'HIS' name, so i looked over and she let me walk over and i drew a big ass arrow and pointed it at my friend, and the mother just scoffed and went to the other game shop on the other side of my town.i cannot understand why people are that rude. I had similar... At a Wilkinson. A customer, of what i believe she was a middle aged variety, so the customer asked for a wallpaper that would suit their study and showed me a picture so I stood there and thought about it and they suddenly said "Oh what would you know about this sort of thing. I'll find a female member of staff." I was like "Oh... oh well" I carried on with my business of sorting displays and stuff. Then a female work colleague approached with a customer, the same customer, she said "You're good at art and that stuff. What do you think would work well with this ladies room." and the customer looked at me and said "I tried him before it's hopeless." So I quickly said "White background lavender plant pattern... on one side facing away from the window... the other walls painted the same white as the background of the wallpaper... Light amount... enough for wallpaper... to stand out... looks unique and fashionable. Works well with your desk and window plants."So I just went straight back to what I was doing and my colleague took her to get the things I listed. She was walking away like "Oh, he must be gay ." I was just so annoyed... I felt so useless because I felt like I wasn't supposed to know or do anything other than blindly stack shelves like a simple machine and tell people to find someone else. Sexism to this degree is baffling. Like, why do you assume because of a person's gender they don't understand. I can't hear the word " sexism " anymore without assuming the worst. The "hypersensitive, ultra-entitled people getting mad at mundane social hiccups" kinda bad. Not implying anything, but I'm usually the one who gets yelled at for not standing for two minutes, in the rain, to hold a door open for a portly, unburdened, fully-capable woman , so she can enter the building without issue.But yeah, those people were either rude assholes, or supremely out of touch. I work in Game currently and have experienced this exact thing multiple times from men and women! A woman told me men know what they're talking about more regarding headsets and tried to laugh with me about it. I asked a man if he needed help and he looked at me said 'oh... sorry' then turned to a male colleague to ask about buying an Xbox (turned out he was a massive prick to everyone in the shop). Another time some one came up to me at the till and I said what can I do for you and he said I'll get served by him (indicating to my male colleague) because he's a laddy. Working in the restaurant/fast food profession the worst customers are men, no matter what age . I've been yelled at, I've been hit on in creepy fucking ways, scoffed at by them. The women on the other hand have been amazing, kind and 'defensive' towards rude male customers. When one man was yelling at me for literally no reason some young women defended me and cut him off until he left. They saw I was shaken up so they lightly joked about it when they ordered and simplified their order as much as possible while being super kind.I think that may prove differently in cases like retail, especially in 'male dominated' areas. I remember working in an all-round store (store that holds a lot of different stuff for a low price) and a woman asked for a male colleague for a inflatable boat in front of her two daughter and I was like ??? I knew what she wanted to know (my boss had her) and showed her yet she was so dismissive and basically branded both me and my boss as morons and left. I know just how to deal with women like this. I normally kind of brush off male sexism and just keep it moving, but female on female sexism in my eyes is completely unforgivable. Not only will I make her feel like the stupidest twat on earth, I will make sure she is greatly inconvenienced and I will look her DEAD in her eye with a smile too. I have a few of these women "come around" after they realize they have been inconvenienced and they've set themselves up for extra work, but I will say, "I'm sure a nice young man can help you out, precious. Your prince will come around some time", or something along those lines. Sometimes I put them right on blast, saying they specifically want the help of a man aloud so everyone can hear. If the guy(s) in question specifically asks me why, I just look at the woman saying "Oh, I'm sure she's got her reasons." or, "beats me," or "I'm just a girl", or just "I don't know nothin' bout nothin'", or, "my lady brain can't possibly help with this lady's question/issues, do you mind assisting the (young/polite/wonderful/lovely/gracious) little lady, kind sir?"I've had a few women catch onto what I was doing, and tried to "school" me about the "way of things", or "who do I think I am", but I just politely asked them to also get me a male to help explain it further. Shiteating grin included. If the women are more feisty and react in kind with a snippy attitude, or even outright say that I have a "problem", I am more than willing to play the dumb woman who doesn't know anything... because.. that was your first assumption... wasn't it? Precious? Cock head. Smile. Watch them smack their lips and leave. One "professional" woman even wanted to brawl in the parking lot, office suit and all, because she knew I pointed her out for her buffoonery, and she got even less info from the men she thought would help her out better. She could have gotten my help, however, the person who didn't mind my help got the deal that slipped right through her fingers because she wanted to pull that mess. And I made SURE she knew it too (while speaking in my obvious dumb-blonde sarcasm voice) She lost an opportunity to save 55k that day. Oh well lady, you missed out saving 55 grand and got no help, no newer knowledge, no new connections or networkings, and you snoozed and lost while pulling your stunt. Bye...and take your bias with you. I'll be sure to give you a wave and a twitched-nosed blink and smile if you glance back my way with your bared teeth before you let that door hit you on your ass. Most women like this just give me a death glare combined with a look like they just ate a lemon coated in Warhead sugar. I know why some women do this, and I'll give you a hint, it's not often the case that they think the guy knows more either. I am MORE than willing to act like an even bigger asshole than they are. In those cases, I was nice, smiled, was professional, took time out of my day and was willing to spend my time, resources and knowledge in a certain field to help you out, and you're just going to act like that doesn't matter, treating me all dismissive...treating me like that over something I can't control. Sometimes even trying to humiliate me for your own amusement in front of your guy friends. Oh, no. It's O-WN. Berserk button pushed. Seriously. Fuuuuuuck- ah- youuuuuuu-ah. I'm a stalwart feminist, and people think that feminists always think men are the sexist ones. But that's just not how it works, I think middle aged to older women can be awful when it comes to sexism. They've already internalised many patriarchal narratives and are loath to let go of them. My mother was the one who tried to tell me that video games were for children and boys, that I would grow out of it, she even stopped me from buying a game store voucher for my best friend because she didn't believe a girl would want that. I think she used it as an excuse as to why she didn't like games, or wasn't good with computers, then put those internalised expectations on others. To be fair, growing up she wasn't allowed to even touch technology, her parents thought learning how to type was useless and that girls should learn home ec, sewing and cooking and such. Her father didn't even want her to finish school. After internalising those messages it's hard to break free of them. It's the same for men a lot of the time. Sometimes sexism isn't just people being douchebags (although the people in the video were incredibly rude), often people have had very old fashioned ideas forced on them at childhood that they internalise and then pass onto others.	Old, Sexism	Age - Over 65s, Gender - General	3/227	1.322
+Thad HenryEgalitarian != Feminist though. Egalitarianism is broad, and while linguistically it is a movement, it doesn't actually have activism directly attributed to it, so it has no momentum. There wasn't and isn't a term for feminism besides feminism. Feminism was never a belief, it's always been a movement, and that's why it's important. It isn't passive, and it exists to create change. The hate it gets is really just misattributed fear. If you espouse any ideals regarding equality of the sexes, you're going to be labeled a feminazi and get hate anyway.I understand why people want to identify as egalitarians instead of feminists, but often it just impedes progress. It isn't helpful to demonise the movement that's making change, while support one that is essentially equivalent, but without momentum. It is far better to be a part of the feminist movement, while remaining critical of its weaknesses, so that you can play a part in guiding it to the right destination. Lauren is really on the right track with that.	Feminazi	Gender - Female intelligence	1/173	0.578

Xoire but It's very difficult to actually support feminism when it's already gotten to the point of incredible distaste. People don't have a bad opinion of egalitarianism because it's a simple righteous belief, and i'm willing to say ALMOST all of Americans actually believe in it. Thats why it isn't a movement. Feminism doesn't have that luxury anymore, because the movement had basically made men into their enemy, thereby already turning away half the population. And it's hard to go back after hearing radical feminists both talk about killing all men and putting men and zoos only to keep alive to breed with. OBVIOUSLY THESE PEOPLE ARE CRAZY AND DO NOT REPRESENT MOST OF FEMINISTS (I can find links to feminists saying this if you'd like). But you can't just come back from that. Yes feminism has the movement behind it. But it can't grow the movement because of the distaste it has.Also about how they are dealing with damage control, it is terrible. Normal feminists, average day to day people know the radical feminists are crazy , and they will also call them feminazis, but these feminazis will still call themselves feminists. Which still groups them with normal feminists. So it still leaves this terrible feeling surrounding the movement	Crazy	Physical Identity - Physical (and Mental) Impairments	2/210	0.952
--	-------	---	-------	-------

+Thad HenryNo offence, but this is a horrible line of reasoning that doesn't hold up. There are Muslims who are terrorists, this does not make Islam reprehensible. The Westboro Baptist Church exists, this does not make Christianity difficult to support. There are very outspoken racists and KKK members that support the Republican party, this does not make Republicans unelectable. The reason for the terrible feeling surrounding the feminist movement is not radical feminists. Radicals always exist. The problem plaguing feminism is the well-intentioned people who choose to only focus on the non-issue of the radicals, instead of the very real issues that people are facing. This is just an optics issue, getting suckered into a zeitgeist. Feminism has not made men into their enemy, it is actually doing a great deal for men, and is probably the only movement that seeks to help men. It is responsible for the attention that men's mental health is getting, and it is challenging the way we impose unrealistic ideals of masculinity upon men in a way that leads such mental health issues. It is opening up our right to express ourselves the way we want. Egalitarianism isn't doing that, because it's really just a label people call themselves to say "I'm not a bad guy", not a movement people take action under. You can cherry pick a minute subsection of the group and heavily publicise it very easily. You can spark outrage and get clicks doing this, and inciting anger really is the best way to get attention and ad revenue. But the truth is, those people don't represent the group because they change nothing. It doesn't matter if a bunch of feminists say to kill all men, because frankly, no one's doing that. There is no law defending it and there never will be. However, in blocking the progress of a movement by undermining the work that positive feminists do (the ones that actually DO make change), you aren't doing anyone any favours. You aren't changing the impression people have of those who tackle gendered issues, you're simply straw-manning a huge swathe of people and inciting outrage without actually changing anything. The only change that really occurs is regressive. It opens up discussions for women returning to a disempowered state, which we're seeing all over the place now - and it's blamed on feminism as though it incited the backlash, when in reality, the backlash was incited by outrage journalism.	Mental, Nothing	Age - Youngsters, Physical Identity - Physical (and Mental) Impairments	3/409	0.733
---	-----------------	---	-------	-------

Xoire no offence taken. It's just an honest debate. And I do wholeheartedly agree that an organization, or in this case a movement, should not be overly criticized by the actions of their most radical members, every example you bring up being a great one.And while I don't hate all feminists because of the actions a few of them have taken, very few people are as tolerable as you or I. And the effect caused by the radicals has permanently left a distaste that many others will not overlook.And you are 100 correct it is an optics problem, people shall continue to view feminism as a bad movement to follow no matter how much it changes. The yellow journalism that has followed feminism has corrupted it's view too much, but it still has it's truths too. But I despise modern journalism and news reporting, from fox news to CNN it's all political bullshit, watching either will trick you into one way of thinking, watching both just confuses a person.And I don't believe the idea of equality needs a movement, because they can do say as much as they want do as much as they want, try to get public officials to support their cause (Which just isn't smart, as soon as the political figures start to try to fix society in their own way there will be instant red flags and backlash)And feminism has already been blocked. With how it is perceived nowadays it doesn't have the support to change as much as it wants to.But I can go ON and On about it's flaws but that isn't what helps. What would help is ideas to fix the problem.If I were to fix the movement, I'd just create an entire new one. It's too late to fix the public view of it once it is as set in stone as it is.Ditch the name, I'm sorry but the name feminism for what it's trying to support is quite stupid."Here let's promote equality but having the female pronoun!" See the problem?I would change it to humanism, it just makes more sense. It's supposed to help everyone no matter the gender. Quit the double standards that plague both sexes, if a man says they are just better than woman, ofc call him out, (but if he says something such as, "women on average are not as strong as men" that's a fact that you can debate him on)While at the same time, call out the women who say "insert radical feminist quote" ESPECIALLY if they say they are part of the movement.Humanism is already a belief that all people are equal. So keep it both a belief and a movement.Tackle real problems, don't become like Aniti Sarkeesian and try to ruin platforms of entertainment for people. +Thad Henry I actually do very much agree with a lot of what you're saying here, especially the crux of what you're getting at. That said, I don't agree with feminism having been blocked, nor do I agree that it can no longer create positive change. Honestly, I've been on your side of the argument before, and I do get where you're coming from - but what made me change my position was entering the discourse myself. The truth is that when you see where feminism is actually discussed - on published papers and within fields where it is needed, not on weird articles on the internet from attention-seeking journalists and bloggers - it has a positive impact. I'm skeptical of creating a new movement, because honestly, it just continues to create divisions and historically that has never worked out. From all sides of the political spectrum. The left wing suffers in the UK from having itself be spread thin across so many different political parties. The IRA suffered heavily from its constant splintering. I'm whole-heartedly for refining a movement based upon achieving its core principles, rather than simply ditching it due to mischaracterisation. The real need for it to be a movement and not a belief is not to instigate changes in politics, but to instigate change socially. It's to challenge our views and to refine our attitudes, so that we can look at ourselves critically. Holding a belief is static, we keep them and they're rarely changed. Most people agree that women have equal value to men, but not everyone agrees with what standards men and women should be held to. Largely they don't even notice when they're holding them to different standards. That said, I'm not against Humanism. I think it's a far more logical approach to the conversation than egalitarianism, because it actually does instigate change, and truthfully, it is divorced from a lot of problematic stereotypes. But there's also a principle that needs to be defended - a movement should not have to rebrand itself every time it's smeared. In my opinion, people really should adopt both banners. Doing so allows you to lead by example. Radical feminists are actually disempowered by the focus of feminism shifting to positive feminism rather than extremes, anyway. Divorcing feminism from positive values will really only give them the platform to co-opt the entire movement for themselves, and flooding the scene with that brand of feminism is going to catch on to young girls who look up to older feminist heroes. I really believe they should just be given less attention, and we need more examples of people willing to take the title of feminist and display it for what it is - and what it does. I do somewhat disagree with the Anita Sarkeesian point too, though. She didn't have the best approach, her reasoning was often weak, and she was really bad at dealing with the response. She was very unclear about what she was even trying to do. As much as I dislike her impact upon feminism, there was value in what she was attempting to do, however. Exposing sexism within video games should be done with the desire to improve them. So I'm actually in favour of criticising games from a feminist perspective - because in analysing them you can open up potential ways to improve upon the formula. The problem with Sarkeesian is that it really seemed like she picked up the topic without a desire to improve it, but just with the desire to point	Nothing, Sexism, Thin, Weird	Age - Youngsters, Gender - General, Physical Identity - Physical (and Mental) Impairments, Physical Identity - Physical Features	4/766	0.522

+Jesus Christ on a bike! [LINK] [LINK] Since it's unlikely for most people to resonate with progress in women's equality, I'd like to cite instances where feminist discourse has influenced the way we view mental health for men. The pressure for men to squash their emotions is being challenged, and it is becoming increasingly unacceptable to shame men for displaying vulnerability. But most importantly, it's influencing the way we reach out to men struggling with depression from a medical perspective. The fact that when men commit suicide, no one ever suspected they had any problems at all is disturbing. And feminism is really the only movement I've ever seen attempt to tackle that. A much more obvious example would just be the reproductive rights debate. Or providing support and safe spaces for victims of domestic abuse and rape, which is an ongoing effort.	Mental	Physical Identity - Physical (and Mental) Impairments	1/143	0.699
You're first article states that 'women's mental health isn't taken seriously', which is extremely doubtful. +Jesus Christ on a bike!That is not extremely doubtful, it is an incredibly reasonable and uncontroversial statement. It never makes the claim that doctors say "who cares" it suggests that it is very easy for women's mental health problems to be attributed to their nature as women without being properly analysed (subconsciously or otherwise). They cite hysteria as an example. No doctor says "who cares" but some are wont to not give proper consideration to the issues, whether they realise it or not. That ISN'T a claim that women have it harder than men, though, it's just one aspect in which mental health isn't taken seriously enough through the lens of gender . In all likelihood, some doctors are likely to handwave women's problems as a hormonal issue or poor self-control of their own bodies.Plus, it's fine to disagree with some claims. You haven't really produced a counter-argument to my point there at all, which leads me to believe that you've conceded that feminism does make change. You've just zeroed in on a very specific point you disagree with, which isn't actually part of my argument to begin with.Also, just lol buzzfeed. It's precisely the type of journalism I'm talking about. Notice how many views it has and how many dislikes it has. It's selling outrage. If they wanted to actually reach out to people and build a positive fanbase, they aren't stupid. They know that videos like that won't cut it. But those videos do get clicks. No one agrees with them, not even the vast majority of feminists, and they know that. Anyway, I've already addressed the point of vocal minorities anyway, so this is really just a circular argument, since it doesn't bring anything new to the table. One of the biggest problems for feminism in recent years is one of overzealous solidarity; when some reasonably high-profile pop-feminist comes out and says something that's kinda crazy or offensive, other feminists have been very reluctant to call them out on it publicly, and that absence of public pushback leads everyone else to conclude that 'well, this must be what they all think'.EDIT: There's also of course the very real fear that if somebody DOES speak up against they will come under fire by the twitter mob who will ostracize them and declare them an enemy, but I don't think that's especially unique to feminism, but seems to be a growing problem with internet communities at large... Xoire there is a big problem with both feminists that want female supremacy and egalitarists: men and women are not the same, women are optimized for giving birth and raising toddlers, but that optimisation means that they are not as good as men at all other things. Because believe it or not humans from a physical pov are limited beings with limited resources. Women are much less physically strong than men and they are also less intelligent. As someone wisely said: women are the most responsible teenager in the house. Feminist have shouted loud that they can do it, but from Rosie the riveteer until now they just continuously proven that no they cannot do it . I had to deal with this crap working at EB Games, mostly from females too. It was usually women who had come in with their son or boyfriend and didn't actually play games themselves. Because they didn't like games they couldn't comprehend that other females did and could be knowledgeable about them too. A few examples, one woman rang up and asked specifically to speak to a man, when I asked why she replied "because they know more about this stuff". Another woman got into a huge argument with a myself and another female coworker. She thought we were lying about being into games, because "games are for boys". Had a few people insisting on waiting for male colleagues when I was free to help. My colleagues were cool about it though, one even said to a customer, "sure, you can get served by me, someone who has only been working here a few months and doesn't actually play games or by my female colleague who has worked here for years, played games her whole life and happens to be the store manager."	Woman	Gender - General	2/183	1.093

I had a similar experience here in Germany. I worked at a cinema back then and the movie "La La Land" just came out. Mainly so we could provide information about current movies to customers without spending our free time watching them. In the evening, a group of woman came into the cinema and asked questions about the movie. I watched it a couple of days ago so my memory was still fresh and I started explaining the main plot of the movie without any spoilers until one of the woman suddenly interrupted me and asked if I could find a female co-worker of mine to answer their questions. I asked why and she replied that I, as a guy, am unable to find joy in romantic movies and that I would be unable to capture any of the feelings in it, so my information and interpretations of the movie and my experience of the emotions in it weren't worth anything because I'm a guy. The thing is, it's really idiotic to judge someone based on gender . Because if you're a woman working in a games store then I don't see the issue. There's no difference between the male brain and the female brain, there's just the toxic message that women are pretty and men are smart. Although it wasn't directed towards me, but directed towards my Assistant Store Leader who was a Female. She was training me at the time, and told her to watch her interact with customers. So she walked up to a guy and ask what he was looking for after greeting him. The guy said oh nothing just looking around than walked off. My ASL came back and began to show me more stuff to learn. Than the guy came to me and wanted to ask some questions. So I came up to him with the encouragement from my ASL, and started answering some questions. However, he got mad when i didn't know about a certain game I haven't play yet. So I said I would get my manager to answer this one. When I got my ASL the guy said "Oh I didn't ask her because I figure she wouldn't know since she's a girl." I told her I couldn't change it right then and there because I don't work in produce and I was in the middle of sweeping with a big push broom but I was going to tell someone when I was done which would be in a minute. She responded by screaming at me and repeatedly telling me to change it now and I kept trying to tell her I couldn't do it right now and she stormed off to report me. But fortunately for me not only did the other customers ask if I was okay but the manager asked if I was okay too and I didn't get in trouble which is good since I did nothing wrong. Welcome to the club. I used to work at GAME in Newcastle before they closed it and moved location. The first day on the job I see these guys are having a conversation behind the counter because in game nobody works. I thought I would walk up as a friendly dude and start chatting and the jack black looking one turns to me and says " Stack the shelves mate we're talking about having sex with Herbie the car " So I start stacking in alphabetical order which is pointless since people don't put them back that way. I Remember this kid that would come in everyday and scream harry potter in my face. So after two weeks of unpaid work and the staff wondering if Donkey Kong would give a good blowjob. I lost it , The kid comes in and I just looked at him when he bought this popular game at the time I took his money and went " Oh you die in the end of this after your sidekick betrays you" then I went up to the guys and was like " Maybe you should ask if the mirror would have sex with you , Because you can go and fuck yourself " After that I get sent on my fifteenth made up task of the day ( honestly they should of just sent my out for tartan paint and had their laugh) so I'm now playing inspector gadget trying to juggle 4 coffees, Two subways,3 bags , and a bunch of DVDs from outside back to the store . After all that they say well you have the job and then hire their mate instead . Who then takes the DVDs off me sits in the staff room and goes " Do you think Stan smith would be a good lover" . I learnt a valuable lesson that day when you're in a GAME store always ask for something you know the staff cant find. I worked in game and game station for years, I never had sexism from any people who worked there and 99.99 of all customers were fantastic and not sexist in the slightest. However... The worst encounter I had - A gentleman phoned the store and I picked up, he asked for help with his PC and installing a specific game. I asked him what the game was but he cut me off mid sentence and said "Could you please put me on the phone with a man". I was shocked, but did as he requested and placed a senior member of staff on the phone to him. The guy asked, "I need someone to help me with my PC, can you put on the most qualified person to help with PC's please" and my colleague more than obliged and passed the phone right back to me. The customer was then the one in shock, told me the game and I helped him through his issue. He really was apologetic and in the end, I think he learnt not to prejudge. I work at GameStop and YES I CALLED IT. Sexist women are the worst. I've had people say similar to my face as well and boy does it get me boiling!!!! Like I've been working here for a year and playing games for my entire life, I'm as much as a gamer as my male coworkers and an assistant store leader at that!! And I know so many other store leaders in my area who are women as well. I had an inventory this past week and there were only two guys out of at least 8 store leaders, and our District leader is a woman as well. I'm sorry you had to experience this. I used to work in a department store, I had been there for several years. I ended up working on the lady's clothing section because they were desperate for staff. I had several instances of women asking to speak to a woman instead of me. I totally understand that when talking about sizes and whatnot, that some women may be uncomfortable talking to a man, but I had one woman who was clearly confused about a price issue. I approached her and offered help to which she looked down her nose at me and said "no thank you". She then walked over to the nearest female member of staff, who just so happened to be on her first week with the store to ask her a question. That member of staff politely apologised, because she didn't know the answer, and proceeded to bring the lady over to me to ask. The look on the customer's face was priceless. I worked in the lumber department of a Home Depot for a year and let me tell you, I got ALL the sexist comments, from both men and women. And even my coworkers, at least the men, as they would just laugh off my complaints, but that's a whole other rant. ANYway. I expected the male customers to give me grief. But when the women did it, I wanted to slap them across the face and be like, I AM TAKING YOU SERIOUSLY. A MAN WILL NOT. And more often than not, my male coworkers never knew what the women wanted/needed. I did manage to convert a few women and even had a few regulars who loved coming to me BECAUSE I was a woman in a male dominated department. A lot of the younger male customers like me, too, as did a lot of the older ones. It was the middle ground customers that gave me grief. I loved learning new things from the older ones, as they helped me grow without criticizing my lack of skills in some things. I'm still not sure how smart it was for this one pair of morons who heckled me while I was driving the fork lift, as I was on a piece of heavy machinery and labouring under just a big enough case of the Fukits to spear them and declare the murder charge worth it. On the flip side of that, many of the truck drivers I unloaded product for complimented my skills and said I was better than my male counterparts. When you think about how many people these guys have seen unloading trucks, it's a big deal to be praised. And no, they weren't being sarcastic at all (I'd asked). Ooooh boy, I have to share some experiences so buckle in. For context: my stepfather owns a workshop and is a boat mechanic. So my mum would help him out in the workshop at times by demolishing motors, doing office work, and generally helping him out. She has a lot of general knowledge about outboard motors and can surely help people out... But my stepfathers new customers do not see her like that, all they do is check her out and make remarks to my step-dad about his office lady (real awkward doing that to the person she is in a relationship with tbh). When he would leave her in charge to go down the road to do things sooooo many people would walk in, go to ask her for help, realise my step-dad isn't there, say something along the lines of "you won't know what I am talking about anyway..." and leave! They would ring back later to ask to speak to my step-dad, what the hell. Now my best friend of 14 years has an engineering qualification, but so many people will not hire her because she is female. She is helping out my step-dad at his workshop just to gain experience and has already seen firsthand how sexist customers can be. Yet again customers will make sly remarks about how they think my friend is attractive (she is a 21 year old with curves, and has a boyfriend, the customers are older than her parents). She has also dealt with customers ignoring what she is saying and her advice and gone straight to my step-dad, or waited for him to be free so they can bug him and he can tell them exactly what she just told them. My friend has fixed so many things that have had my step-dad stumped for a while, yes he has had his workshop for over 20 years, doesn't mean he is an expert. He accepts this and will ask my friend for her ideas in front of the customers so they can see that yes, my friend actually knows her shit when it comes to engineering and mechanics. I guess when going into a male dominated field, you can never win, there will always be that slight bias, which sucks. In my field there isn't the gender bias, but age bias, people would rather have someone in their late 20s teach their kids English. I am just as qualified and have a lot of previous teaching experience, and I am only 21. Overall, it is frustrating having to deal with people having a bias and a stereotype of what people working in your field should be like.	Age, Gender, Old	Age - General, Age - Over 65s, Gender - General	3/447	0.671
I guess that also depends on the place where you live. Speaking from what I've seen in my hometown, there isn't sexism when considering an engineer, for the people hiring in electronic, mechanical or physics engineering, sex doesn't seem to matter. But on the other hand, while at hiring they don't judge by sex, sexual harassment is pretty commonplace and badly addressed here.	Sex, Sexism, Sexual	Gender - General	4/63	6.349

That's the idea. Intimidate women out of their superior, male-only, holy "safe" sanctuary with every bias, excuse, vile behavior, snub and setback in the book, pamphlet and even the business card. Get the uppity woman so down and out and give up on her dream, that she is left crying back to her playhouse and dollies...where she belongs. However, don't let them win, that's just what the little buggers want. Don't give them that satisfaction. If they try anything underhanded, skeevy, or try to set you up, document, document, document if it gets intrusive or interferes into your life. Take it to state level if you have to. If they are an Asshole Slime 2.0 and try to get outright violent or try to jump you, bust a cap in their saggy asses or bash their thick skulls in with the heaviest thing you can find. You're always going to run into assholes, male or female who are absolutely dead-fast, obsessed and intent on keeping you down and who don't want you to succeed or do better in life for yourself. It's the way of things, and only you are going to be the one who can decide if you are going to do something about it or keep letting them pull their bullshit.	Woman	Gender - General	1/214	0.467

i didnt say all, i said majority, women IN GENERAL. Women in general stay away from areas considered male ie. STEM, gaming, simply because it doesnt appeal to them not because of sexism . maternity leave can be devastating if the woman holds a higher up job, hence why they dont get promoted, and what happens if they get pregnant more than once. women being employed is why birth rates are going down in west countries, WHICH IS FUCKING BAD. you know what happens when the woman works and the man doesnt? divorce, 50 of marraige ends in divorce and 75 of that 50 happen when woman out earns the man. At Drabnail777:Depends on the woman . She may not even want to have children and might pursue her career instead. If she does want children however, here is a list of possible outcomes: Please note that this is barely scratching the surface of the many types of families that exist.Hetero-Normative Families: Gender Swap Nuclear Family: Exactly the same except the woman works and the man stays at home.Equal Share Family: Both parents go to work and both parents help raise children and do house work.Nuclear Family with Added Income: Same as nuclear family with woman as stay at home wife and husband going to work, but the wife has a part time job. Gender Swap Family With Added Income: Same as above except it is the wife who earns the lions share of the money.Non Hetero-Normative Families:Man lives with man Woman lives with woman Then you have the many combinations involving transgender couplings.Poly Amorous SetupsOther Types of Families:Two sisters look after the childrenSingle Parent Families: They have do a full time job and do 100 of the raising children and housework.Work at home Parents: Parents often have stay at home jobs that grant them flexibility to be work at home parents and stay at home parents.Multiple Families: Both parents have children from multiple relationships. Those children have more than two parents. It's complicated.One Huge Family: So we have the parents, grand parents, uncles, unties, nephews, nieces, plus friends of family members all functioning as one huge family unit. Raising children is a huge endeavour undertaken by a community, not just two parents.	Gender, Transgender, Woman	Gender - General, Sexual Identity - Transexuality	8/274	2.92

drabnail777 i have never seen you say "in general, women..." And if you think just saying "women" implies that, you're wrong. Besides, the point I'm trying to make is that because of these ideals, women who do go against the grain and want to go into these fields have it way harder because of this kind of bullshit. And for your information, birth rates going down is good, it's good for the overall economy and the rest of the population. Like, did you not study this? If a country's birth rate is lower, then the people live longer because the more children a family has the poorer they are. These are actual facts scientists and demographists have studied and are not bullshit percentages like "when the man doesn't work and the woman does 50 of marriage ends in divorce". It's already bullshit cause of that percentage, where did you even get that from? Google? Or did you just pull that from your ass based off of your "observation". Look, I completely get when you say when women aren't interested in STEM or other men related things. It's true, a lot of women aren't. But what I'm arguing about is there are also some women who are interested in STEM and even though in some cases these women are more qualified than men since they've had to work harder to even get into it, they're denied because they're chosen over a man. It's the point of this video. Clearly, she's just as much qualified to help these customers since she knows what she's doing but she's shut down for being a woman. She's looked down upon for being a woman. She's put into a box labelled "woman, cannot help go look for a man". And that's sexism.	Sexism, Woman	Gender - General	5/296	1.689

AimaeArt- more children a family has the poorer they are, i guess but that would depend on the salary of the parents, if they can support more kids or not, which should be main factor in deciding to have more kids. pls explain why declining birth rate is good economy, you want birth rate to be at replacement level which due to women working is not happening, 1 reason for a stable birth rate is you want enough white people to be majority so shitholers muslim immigrants dont destroy west civilization. bout 40 to 50 percent of married couples in the United States divorce. The divorce rate for subsequent marriages is even higher. [LINK] work harder to get it- lool shows how out of date you are, universities actively discriminate against men when securing places for STEM subjects, school systems are made favour girls, teachers mark girls papers higher for maths for the same work etc. plenty of public assistance and women still dont like STEM subjects nor are as good remember the bridge collapsing being led by all female team. i told you why a man with same qualification may be used to be chosen over woman because he wont get pregnant and leave and STEM subjects are serious jobs, even if the woman is self proclaimed "career oriented", who knows how she might feel in future and comapines cant gamble on that, companies cant have liabilities. Its just that Gaming is a male thing, you just expect a guy to know more about gaming. Likewise, you would want to talk to female at a makeup store or some other woman store rather than a guy (if a man is even working there in the first place), i dont see public campaigns to get males into female spaces like nursing or sales at sephora or some shit	Woman	Gender - General	3/308	0.974

drabnail777 I can't help but feel you are a troll.Yes, there are tendencies. But why go to a video where women discuss going into careers because they wanted to and then say, "But women don't want to enter those careers".It's pretty clear they DID want to enter those fields... It's actually your way of thinking that is detrimental. If a women is the best mechanic at a place, then it's best to consult the person who has the most knowledge. Why would I want to go to the less knowledgeable man? In this specific case she was clearly regarded as not only being interested in the field, but in knowing more than her male counterpart on the job.You don't even seem to be addressing the situation that was presented, so it's hard to say that you're even making an argument to begin with. Unless your argument is that all women are the same and therefor the woman who is superior at the job and has not abandoned her job is the same as someone who knows less and leaves her job.	Woman	Gender - General	1/184	0.543
+Eisah Vakohlerhow many female mechanics you know or even seen? and what are the chances shes better than the guys there? low and even lower. suppose this unicorn existed, its still a male profession, ppl expect a man to know better and thats how it was, is and will be- for the sole reason women dont like doing work. in this video she had to ask several times what the boy was saying so the mother assumed that she didnt know what he was talking about when said turtle beach headphones? (lol i wonder if any woman even does, if i went up and asked if you guys have turtle beach brands). +JamEngulfer yes she knew, but the mother, who is a woman , thought she op didnt know what the headphones were and correctly thought that a man would know since it is a male thing, we have to consider this from the point of the mother. who herself holds this "sexist" view, which isnt really sexist, its just GENERALLY true and even for the mothers view she probably has seen even less females in male areas when she was young since she herself knows that most women dont know or/and do not like video games etc. and that is still largely true today. I had a similar issue when I worked in Fry's (a grocery store). While taking carts inside of the store I heard a few elderly ladies ask "Why do they always have the 'little girl' do this job?". I know being a courtesy clerk was originally a boy's job but you would think they'd be somewhat used to seeing both genders moving shopping carts. Plus I was in my late 20s' at the time. Another time I had to very nicely tell an older woman in a wheel that no "strong, young men" were helping her because I was the only one available to do so. These people do realize that knowing things about games and knowing the store and the emplacement of the product was your JOB ?This goes far beyond " woman don't know games", we're at the " woman don't know anything about her own job" point. I've had something pretty similar happen to me at Walmart. There was an elderly lady that needed help finding things around the store, which is pretty normal for my Walmart. I walked around and helped her find things, and one of the things she needed was some batteries for her tv remotes. She told me that when we were done she was going to need to find a young man to help her put the batteries into the tv remotes. Yes I a 19 year old female that has changed batteries out of so many things over the years couldn't possibly know how to do that. To be fair she literally did not know how to put batteries into a remote, but you know to assume that only because I am female I wouldn't know how was crazy to me. She did let me show her how, and she did seem really shocked that i knew how to do it. You know it's still crazy to me because it was just regular AA and AAA batteries in standard tv remotes that is so universal, at least I thought. Haha, wow. Not even knowing how to put batteries in a remote is pretty extreme. I hope that elderly lady learned to not immediately judge women like this...	Elderly	Age - Over 65s	1/28	3.571
Let's give her a little bit of credit, she didn't even know how to work batteries. She obviously wasn't very caught up with the times, and at least she wasn't being rude she just didn't know. Old people aren't always upto date with stuff :3	Old	Age - Over 65s	1/45	2.222

TechnoKnight exactly. Honestly it kinda makes me feel a bit useless when someone, usually a guy, tells me I know nothing about games. When I worked at GAME as a Christmas temp I was sad to say I didn't enjoy it. I passed the interview and was asked if I'd start the next day. While I knew a lot about what I was doing the customers were terrible at times. Adults pissed because they couldn't look in surprise boxes, teenagers pissed that they weren't old enough for 18 games and the most irritating of all... the generic "oh girls play games?", "I doubt you can help me, can one of the guys help me?" Ugh.	Old	Age - Over 65s	1/92	1.087

Really ironic that the kid and the old man were more open minded, sensitive and less sexist than the women. It's usually the older generation of women who don't believe in the young women to know something that 'boys' should know and even sometimes women around your age or younger makes that assumption as well.
